officials and BL management on Saturday morning after three negotiating sessions spanning 39 hours. The formula was agreed only half an hour before BL's deadline for sending out dismissal letters to the strikers. It was proposed that the formula would be put to the mass meeting factually and without recommendation, but Mr David Buckle, Oxford district secretary of the Transport and General Workers' Union, said last night that he did not believe the stewards were barred from making a

> A national union official involved in the negotiations said union leaders would be extremely angry if the stewards made a recommendation. There was a specific point made during the negotiations that while there could be consultation with the stewards, it would be inappropriate for them to put any recommendation to the meeting.

Mr Buckle said: "The stewards will be asked at their meeting to go along with the formula, but if they want to pass Turkey's ruling military council has lifted the 1980 ban on political activities, paving the way for a general election would be too happy if the stewards backed the formula Cowley will be open the unions but failed to make a recommen- are planning to mount a picket

BL has agreed to give Cowley assembly audited plant status after agreement on productivity proposals and the ending of washing time, which would increase the weekly bonu ceiling from £18.75 to £30.

Union officials believe they have secured two real gains from the management in a formular which, on the face of it, appears to be a victory for the management's determi-nation to introduce "bell to bell" working at the plant. The unions claim that the old style of management by imposition will be replaced by a regime which seeks to introduce changes by agreement. The company believes it has seen in a new dimension

By the Staff of Nature.

We hear a lot these days about DNA, the double genetic molecule that hath controls every cell in the body and, through the germ cells, passes on instructions to the next generation. It resides in the cell's nucleus, but where is it in the ancleus? How is it arranged?

Those questions might af-fect how the DNA behaves, and how it interacts with itself. as it must, to control develo ment of the embrys and the later activity of the cell in the body. Now Dr David Agard and Dr John Sedat of the University of California at San Francisco have devised a way to answer them

Even now, Dr Agard and De Sedat's work is limited to the gland of the scientists' fareurite fly. Drosophila, but the exciting thing about their technique is that it could be applied almost anywhere.
The method involves simple combination of two instruments from the opp ends of the historical spectrum: the optical microscon and the computer. The two scientists actually exploited a common shortcoming of the microscope, that it keeps in focus only a very thin alice of the object being studied, while everything else is blurred.

They assembled a micro-scope in which this effect was exaggerated to the extent that it could effectively "slice" the Drosophila nucleus, produ images which would reveal the assembly of the DNA in the cell, layer by layer as the focas of the instrument was stepped down through the cell.

The stepping required is too fine for the human hand, so the knob was turned by a lowgeared stepping motor, that moved the focus on by just 1,000 atoms a step. At each step a photograph was taken.
Then a computer was used to calculate what, on each picture, was caused by blu of other levels, and what was caused by the objects actually in focus. Since the scientisti had previously stained the chromosomes (the little string like units in which the DNA is first assembled) the composite pictures that emerged from the computer calculations were the first pictures of the arrangement of the chromo:

son-dividing cell nucleus. The chromosomes in these Dresophila cells appear to arrange themselves in parallel groups in certain places and in controlled groups in others. repeated in each saliva cell that Dr Agard and Dr Sedat

After this discovery, many questions crowd in. Does the organization repeat itself is other cells of the fly? Or does each tissue have a different pattern? How does the arrangement correspond to the arrangement of the genes on the chromosomes?

Which genes does it place next to which, and why? What of other organisms? The beauty of this sample work is that these questions arise, and offer, literally, a new dimension to genetics. Source: Nature 21 April, Vol 302 GNature-Times News Service, 1983.

Tories likely to weather the storm

Labour needs a swing of 6 to per cent from 1982's voting figures to get the six extra wards it needs for outright control. Given the unemployment, the ostentatious moderation of Labour leaders in the city and the disappearance of the Falklands factor", Labour ought to triumph.

But there is no such optimism. At best, Labour might gain two seats from the Liberals and force the Conservatives to govern without an overall If Labour had the wind in its

The Alliance claims to be on the point of toppling Labour from its control of Worcester. The Social Democrats talk of inroads in rural Warwickshire and Worcestershire.

Officers' wider powers are at centre of concern

The controversial Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, which gives new, wideranging powers to the police, will shortly emerge on the floor of the Comments for its final stages before entering the House of Lords. In this three part series Frances Gibb looks at the Bill in detail in the stages people to the floor made. changes made to it after widespread criticism.

The Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, the main plank of the Government's law and order policy, will bring in wide range of new police powers to stop, search and arrest; new procedures for holding and questioning suspects and a new police complaints proceedures with provision for police community consultations.

Much critisized in the Commons for not providing safeguards for suspects' rights to balance the new police powers, it could also receive a bumpy ride in the Lords,

The Bill has come under fire first for what it omits. Based in part on the report of the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, it omits two of that body's main proposals: an independent prosecution sys-tem, separate from the police interrogations. Both are now under review by the Home

The Bill's central concept, and trigger for many of the powers, is the "serious arrestable offence". That is an offence that police, or a magistrate, deem sufficiently serious to justify use of certain powers. After much criticism, the Bill's approach to this has

Reagan to tell Congress of moral duty to stop a second Cuba

From Nicholas Ashford, Washington

President Reagan is to make a rare address to a joint session of Congress on Wednesday in an attempt to persuade doubting Congressmen to support or at least not actively oppose his Administration's policy in Central America.

It will be only the ninth time in the past half century that a President has made such an appearance and his action is intended to dramatize the Administration's concern at the deteriorating situation in the

His addresss is the culmination of a huge lobbying campaign by senior officials who have been urging Congress to approve the Adminstration's request for increased military aid to El Salvador and not to blow the whistle on American covert support for right-wing insurgents fighting against the Government

The campaign has included deep background briefings by Mr William Casey, the head of the CIA, and a guided CIA tour for a small group of Congressmen of the border area between Honduras and Nicaragua where the anti-Sandinist rebels are operating.

The message that the President will deliver will be a simple one. He will argue that Central America is the "front line" and that the US bas a scepticism on Capitol Hill "moral duty" to prevent the proliferation of Cuban-style regimes in the region.

One such regime -Nicaragua - is already as much as the Administration can stomach. Last week Mr Thomas Enders, Assistant Secretary of State, gave warning of the possible introduction to Nicaragua of modern fighter aircraft by Cuba or the Soviet Union and even Cuban combat troops.

If El Salvador fell to the left-wing guerrillas fighting against Salvadoran government forces then, so the Administration contends, the contagion would very quickly spread to Mexico and to Panama in the south.

that it must make the cost of interventionism for Nicaragua particular they feel US attempts and Cuba as high as possible. to bolster the Salvadoran This means giving increased military and economic support forces will be self-defeating to El Salvador so that it can unless they are accompanied by successfully combat the Nicar- pressure on the regime to reach aguan and Cuban-backed insur- a political accommodation with gents. where the memory of involve-ment in Vietnam has not completely evaporated. Some Congressmen, a relatively small minority, believe the US has no business getting involved in the region at all. They argue that the Administration's blinkered determination to see the region's upheavals in East-West terms means that it is incapable of tackling the root causes of the problem - the social, political and economic injustice which has characterized Central America for decades.

A larger group accept the Administration's contention that Central America falls within its sphere of interest, but To prevent this happening, the disagree with the role which the Reagan Administration argues Administration believes the United States should play. In Government and its armed the country.

However, the President will doubt whether this will ever be be met with considerable possible.

However the most contentious issue at present is the covert aid which the US is giving to the Nicaraguan contras. This is not just because the assistince is felt to be in violation of the spirit if not the letter of the Boland Amendment (which forbids aid to guerrillas "for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua") but also because it reeks of similar secret operations in South-east Asia during the 1960s. Such small beginnings can quickly get out of hand and culminate in huge US involvement.

Whatever its deep-felt concerns, however, Congress will be cautions in its reponse and will probably not let the President go away empty-handed. Legislators are aware that if they are seen to be tying the President's hands too tightly, he could lay the blame squarely on Congress in the event of El Salvador being overrun by the guerrillas.

So it seems likely that Congress will ultimately agree to most of what the Administration is asking in terms of increased military assistance for El Salvador, although probably with some conditions attached But Congress will try to restrict as for as possible clandestine US activities in and around

Urgent talks plea by Managua

Managua (Reuter) - Sénor Miguel d'Escoto, the Nicara-guan Foreign Minister, accusing Honduras of complicity in right-wing insurgency in Nicara-gua, has called for direct talks between the two countries

"before it is to late".

Early this month Nicaragua announced it was fighting some 2,000 well-armed right-wing exiles who had infiltrated from bases in Honduras in an operation run by the Honduran Army and the United States.

Since then, there has been a spate of warnings that Honduras and Nicaragua were drifting towards open war. Fears of a conflict between Honduras, the closest ally of the US in Central America, and left-wing Nicaragua have spurred fresh diplomatic efforts to bring peace to Central America.

It appeared intended as a response to Washington's decision last week to throw out three Soviet officials on charges of spying.

The central figure in the report was a Russian named Boris who was said to have been recruited by the CIA while working as a development expert in Africa. On his return Leningrad the CIA demanded he continue to provide information; but he confessed to the KGB and then served as double agent. Meanwhile, Mr Zamyatin, a senior Soviet foreign affairs expert, said relations between Moscow and Washington were unlikely to improve while President Reagan was in power.

Turkey lifts ban on political parties

Ankara (Reuter) - Turkey's ruling military national security council yesterday lifted a 1980 ban on political activities, paving the way for general elections promised for this

Swiss call time on Hongkong

Stung by what they regard as outright provocation, leading Swiss watch manufacturers have taken action to stop a display of watches from Hongkong in premises immediately behind the hall housing the annual European Watch and Jewelry Exhibition in Basle.

A court decision is expected today on the Swiss companies' submission that some of the Hongkong watches are imitat-ions of high-priced Swiss watches with famous names. Some 20 different models from Hongkong were seized by police on Thursday.

At last year's exhibition, the Hongkong exporters were refused display space, but allowed to show their wares privately to prospective customers in a room closed to members of the public. This year the exhibition organizers were under pressure to refuse Hongkong a stand.

Hongkong is now the leading exporter of lower-priced watches, especially quartz ones. Swiss sales of watch components to Hongkong last year were worth £150m, more than four times the value of the colony's watch exports to Switzerland.

The Swiss action reflects the tration at the growing number of cheap imitations of Swiss prestige watches, emanating mainly from Far Eastern countries, including South Korea and

Fanfani seeks to avoid blame

From Peter Nichols, Rome

Senator Amintore Fanfani's coalition Government will almost certainly resign within the week although a formula has yet to be found for allowing a general election without appearing to blame the Government itself for falling apart.

The Administration has been doomed since the Socialists, the second largest partner in the four-party coalition after the Christian Democrats, announced on Friday that they intended to force an election by ners, they wish to avoid being seen as solely responsible for the dissolution of parliament. Senator Fanfani himself is an agreement, however, looks understandably angry at the conduct of his principal allies.

Difficulties of Maoris given royal sympathy

From W. P. Reeves

It was a day steeped in Maori culture aand tradition for the Prince and Princess of Waless vesterday when they were entertained at Te Poho O Rawiri Marae in Gisborne. Under cloudless skies representatives of tribes and schools of the east coast presented hakas and action sones on the lawns in front of the carved meeting house.

Responding to spe ches of welcome, the Prince began with a greeting in Maori, a gesture which delighted the crowd. He went on to talk about the problems of adjustment and adaptability in a complex and technological society, difficulties of special relevance to the Maori people, particularly the young as they moved from traditional rural areas

"Today we live in an era of bewildering change which makes adaption to modern conditions extremely hard", the Prince said. "Developments in technology and in industrial methods, together with the spread of urbanization and all that that means, have helped to wrench us from the sheet anchor of our past, from culture and traditional skills and those things which help to provide us with a sense of meaning." The royal visitors moved freely among the crowd before meeting tribal elders inside the meeting house.

Prince William took the spotlight on Sunday. Making his first publi appearance of the tour, t 10-month-old Prince starred before the 100 cameras of the press corps. Dressed in a lemon shirt and apricot rompers he crawled, stood, gurgled, smiled, said something that might pass for "Dada", and otherwise delighted his parents any political role for himself.

Zia 'sallies forth into political arena'

From Hasan Akhtar

In a bylined front-page news analysis yesterday the editor of Islamabad's only English daily, The Muslim, said General Zia ul-Hag, Pakistan's military ruler since July 1977, has embarked on a three stage political plan leading to his emergence as an acceptable political leader by March 1984. Pakistan has been ruled for most of its 35-year history by Army chiefs.

Mr Mushahid Hussain, the editor, recalled General Zia's recent "Civic Jalsas" - another name for restricted public meetings - in the interior of Sind and at Gujranwala in the heartland of the Punjab, and observed: This is definately a new style of politics which the President has embarked on after being firmly in the saddle for six

"The President seems to be seriously entering the political arena as one of the options available to him in the near future. He said General Zia had decided to "discard the intention to give the country a khakicoloured constitution - one that would provide a permanent constitutional role for the armed forces in running the country'

The editor believes General Zia has been buoyed in his political ambitions by foreign visits since the Soviet ntervention in Afghanistan, including his meetings with the leaders of the United States, China and the Soviet Union as well as by "the improvement in ties with India". Several other political observers do not agree, however. They assert that General Zia will not quit his "military constituency", and will not risk

McEnroe is improvising a volley. His style is no style. It's instantly recognisable, and as hard to grasp as all those dinks and chips he's always hitting. He dangles the racket, drags the head lower than his wrist, waves it away from his body, jumps at the ball, does all the things you're not supposed to do.

McEnroe makes nonsense of the usual geographic descriptons of grips - Eastern, Western, Continental. He holds the racket whichever way he wants. His grip here is a little higher on the racket handle than textbooks would advise, but this gives him extra feel and flexibility -

"wristiness" In spite of his vocal aggression. John's always been a gentle player, a deflector of volleys and precise placer of ground strokes. He's 5ft 1 lin tall and weighs around 165 pounds, but he often gives an impression of frailty. He's prone to injury, a young man whose physical and mental condition are interrelated and finely tuned.

Ivan Lendi resembles a marionette temporarily detached from the puppet master. He's about to strike his fearsome forehand on the loose red clay of the Stade Roland Garros. Wimbledon 1981 mile or two in length, the line from Paddington to Old Oak Common runs through some of the most interesting industrial scenery in London. Jos Pinter's Biscuit Factory, the Nu-Quik Tyre Change Depot, The Harrow Road Jeans Mart, Albert Spandau's Wig and Mask Theatrical Second-Hand Exchange - all these line the route, as a memory of Britain's everchanging role in world affairs. They are all now, unfortunately. Railways.

Above right: Alone, Bjorn Borg changed the way tennis was played during the 1970s. He didn't invent topspin, and he wasn't the first player to use a double-handed grip, but no man had used either of these techniques to such effect. Here, Borg is hitting his twobanded backhand on the Centre Court at Wimbledon. Experts said his style could never adapt to grass, which is slippery and makes the ball bounce low, but Borg won Wimbledon five times between 1976 and 1980, proving that for a man of genius the surface only exists to be subdued.

Many passengers, like myself, start up from their seats at the discovery that we are on the wrong train, and moments later we pass Old Oak Common at about 60 mph. It appears that it is now the custom to announce the destination of the train after its departure, to promote ticket sales among those who are taken hundreds of miles out of their way. But philosophically I sit down to enjoy the scenery of the line which was driven by Brunel with fanatical energy through such suburbs as Ealing. carriages.
At the entrance to each carriage there are automatic doors which open and close at one's approach. The one nearest to me is kept permanently open because a young traveller has placed his rucksack on the spot which controls the door, resulting in the most tremendous draught. I go to engage him in conversation and he tells me with rough good humour what I can do with myself.

We are now going through the most tremendous scenery, which it is just possible to make out through the windows which

He indicates a train lying waiting and pretty soon I am aboard and heading for, as it turns out, Weymouth, the seaside town built by Brunel.

A weekly series reporting on scientific research: EXPLORATION

Adudadus do verynicely in Greenland

Along the cold fringe of East Greenland, any young Briton is likely to be known to the locals as edudadu. The term, which is entirely complimentary, dates back to the British explorer Gino Watkins, who hunted among the ice floes in these parts, introducing himself to the locals with a formal "How do you do?" The greeting was turned quaintly into a noun and has stuck ever since. Since Watkins's day (he was drowned after failing out of his kayak), there have been a number of adudadus from the British School Exploration Society and other expeditions undertaking projects and exploring the same magnificent arctic wilderness for bona fide scientific reasons.

The other day, as my dog team pulled to a panting halt in the centre of a sealing village north of Angmagsalik, I met a group of wind-bronzed young adudacus led by Mr Ray Ward, economics teacher at Kingston Grammar School, They had been out on the far glaciers and snow-choked valleys for several weeks measuring the depths of snow to discover the potential for hydro-

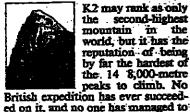

It must have been clear to them that lifestyles have changed in Greenland since the innocent days of Gino Watkins, and the honest Greenlander might now reply "Not very well, thank you" to his polite adudadu. Brigitte Bardot and a host of other conservationist-minded folk have, they feel, ruined the inter-national market for seal skins, which is the mainstay of many a local economy in Greenland. Alcoholism is a severe problem, and in a community where rifles are as common as walking sticks, the murder rate is climbing alarmingly. There is some political pressure to return "to the old values", but the era of the video, of smart fashion and the cordless telephone is not ing hostile ground covered by ice and cut by fast-flowing rivers will be tried out this summer by an expedition that plans to combine the merits of canoes and micro-light-aircraft. An international team, led by Mr Paul Vander-Molen, a British research engineer and widely experienced canocist is to make a south to-north crossing to Reland navigating the full length of the Joladsa River that pours from the Vathajoki

The explorers will arrive in July at the point on the Ideland coast where the first settlers set foot in AD 847. From a lake in the course of the glacier, kept from freezing by geo-thermal warmth, the powered hang-glider, fitted with floats and flown by Mr Gerry Breen, will survey the surface of the glacier, while-care explorers penetrate beneath the ice. Then follows a descent into the crater of the Askia volcano and a fast trip down the wild waters of the river, shooting a 178-foot-high waterfall by anaching the canoes to the undercarriage of the micro-light aircraft. "The neutical will become the aero-nauti cal. Mr Vander-Molen confidently declared. Finance for the project is coming from Britain and France, and films will be made.

The expedition is approved by the Grand Bahama Bahama Grand Bahama Ba Bahana Government. He described the caverns as "incredibly spectacu-lar", with pristine under water formations that will be subjectable to any haphazard or careless explo-ration. It is only about 60 foot down; five miles of passages which have not been completely explored, filled with the most beautiful limestone shapes." The Bahamas National Trust, however, rightly banned anyone from going into the caves. With the rapid spread of interest in scuba diving, the trust is concerned that the fragile environ-ment could be ruined. The expedition will plot the caverns and suggest a suitable management plan.

Crusading in a fantasy world

Iris Murdoch publishes The Philosopher's Pupil on Thursday. It is her twenty-first novel. Herfirst Under the Net was published in 1954. The Sea, The Sea (1978) won her the Booker Prize for

First we were to meet in Steeple Aston. Her place. Then we were to meet in London. My place. Next there was the question of a French trip. Not, for me, unfortunately. Finally, we compromised on Salisbury: By kind permission of Mr and Mrs. Bayley's hostess for the weekend, the widow of a disand a Fellow of St Catherine's College, Oxford.

I was sorry to miss Steeple Aston. In particular, the romantically wild garden through which John Bayley draws paths with a lawnmower. I would have liked to see for myself the greenhouse wherein sits the tank in which Iris Murdoch luxuriates, watched over by a classical bust_

Water is a pervasive theme in many of the Murdoch novels. In early books such as The Bell a lake casts an almost magic presence over the action. In The Sea, The Sea, it is even more-central. In The Philosopher's Pupil much of the action, including the ghastly denoue-ment, takes place at a once Roman spa.

As it turns out, the house in Salisbury is built, English cottage turned Venetian palazzo, right over the deep waters of the River Avon. Professor Bayley regrets that they have not yet swum there. But the regret is tinged by confidence in the future. Sitting above the fiercely swirling water, Iris Murdoch looks a very pretty person. Huge bright blue eyes and child-like complexion. A

She wears a blue and white blouse with a frill Not the expected philosopher's uniform. Iris Murdoch was for 15 years a lecturer in Philosophy at St Anne's College, Oxford. She has published three books of philosophy. Sartre, Romantic Rationalist, The Sovereignty of Good and The Fire and The Sun Two informants had tried to does believe in "spiritual give me a descriptive preview, change". Christ is no more than One had suggested someone a prophet. But the Christian kindly, like a philosopher and mythology is, in her opinion, not at all like a wicked author- very important as "a mode of ess". The second saw her a understanding". The religious perfect reflection of her novels, like a character out of Hieronymous Bosch - the very nicest China and, indeed, in England character". On the whole I am now. She ches as very dangerous inclined to agree with the first the modern notion "that good estimate. Though it must depend and evil can be blurred" and that on one's image of a philosopher. we should learn to accept the The Philosopher of the new dark side of our natures. She says novel is a man; John Robert that "the absolute difference of philosophy is a mug's game. There were not even any books any more. All the books were inside him now. Even the familiar act of reading had been taken from him. It had been his fate not to be interested in anything except everything. If he could live another hundred years, could time reverse its sense and lead him gently into a precious clarity? As it was, he saw through every notion that he had ever had, the 'insights' won by a sustained asceticism appeared to him now as so much rather nasty stuff which he had made up out of nothing. Artists have beauty and nature at their side, but a philosopher must contain his world inside his head until . . . it

The words echo Miss Murdoch's reported view that philosophy is almost impossibly difficult. The Iris Murdoch who sits above the waters of the Avon denies any relationship to her tragic catalyst: (The only character Miss Murdoch admits to drawing from life is the very human dog in her latest book.) Philosophy is difficult, she admits. Particularly her sort which does not divide the intellect from the will. Much recent philosophy sees things of the intellect as "clear and hard and factual" while the will and the emotions are "peripheral and unclear" and that is where the religious instinct is presumed to lie. She says rather regretfully, "I've gone along my own road: I'm really very separate now from Oxford philosophers, which is a pity in a way. . . . The excitement of discussing philosophy has passed out of my life..." Not however out of her mind, nor out of her books, nor even, as a matter of fact, entirely out of her life. In November, 1982, Iris Mur-

It is inevitable that any discussion with Iris Murdoch on philosophy soon leads to what would generally be called a discussion of religion. Having discovered that I am "croyant" a certain freedom seems to enter her conversation. She does not believe in God, "a personal God", which is why Buddhism has such an appeal for her. scribes the effect her novels produce. The characters seem to walk on a tight rope, with only darkness below and no particular end in view. Yet sustained by the very act of staying on and, as Miss Murdoch says, constrained to be always in movement. Our conversation, therefore, moves to the novelist. Though in a sense any attempt to separate novelist and philosopher is

But first there is an interruption in the form of a cheerful John Bayley appearing out of the rain. He has just bought an excellent tweed cap which his hostess later reveals as a product of the Bayleys' favourite shop - "Good as New". We stand up to be unified, clarified ... until he stretch and peer admiringly at Iris Murdoch married John can become a god or else the soaring confidence of the Bayley in 1956. He is Wartin THE PHILOSOPHER'S PUPIL.

One of the most pleasurable

One of the most pleasurable aspects of reading Iris Murdoch's novels is the feeling of confidence she inspires. The voice is so sure, instantly recognizable in the way Pinter or Powell are recognizable. She acknowledges this, though gently pointing out that she's had a few years to work on it and also warning of the danger of complacency, the barrier to progress. She brings to our discussion a wave of enthusiasm and, yes, enjoyment in the battle for creation. None of the fashionable anguish here. She rather gives the impression of a well-equipped warrior going into battle with blood up and determined step.

The novel is, after all, her ereat love and has become her life. The traditional novel, that is. She describes it as a "hall of reflection", a great huge place, "a happy form" which can encompass every sort of comedy, of tragedy. Shakespeare was the first novelist... or perhaps Murasaki Shikiby, who in the eleventh century wrote The Tale of Genji, the great Japanese masterpiece, should be allowed first place. This attitude makes clear why her books cover so many pages.

Of the last three novels by Iris Murdoch, none falls below 500 pages. The Sea, The Sea is 501 pages. Nuns and Soldiers is 505 and The Philosopher's Pupil is 576.·

Critics, even those essentially admiring, have suggested that editorial work would improve the overall impact. But you need volume to fit in all the different aspects of life, as Miss Murdoch describes life. She sees herself as belonging to the Anglo-Russian tradition. She reads the great nineteenth century novels over and over again - "They feed one". She has little time (perhaps literally) for contemporary fiction. But she feels it is in an "interesting" state, the writers unnecessarily concerned with technical problems when all they need to do is "relax" and learn the great form that is there waiting for them. Perhaps her critics would feel she, herself, is too relaxed. Certainly there is a modern brand of impatience which does not wish to chew over images and character in the Murdoch manner.

I find her enthusiasm exhilarating, making me appreciate what an exciting teacher she must have been. (A clever and ebullient friend of mine attending St Anne's in the 1960s had always painted a happy picture of their tutorials together.)

Humbly offering the information that I have written one novel to rival hers in length and another inspired by the story of Anna Karenina, I am rewarded by an encouraging "Well done!" Novel writing, it is clear, is a matter of constant hard work and hard thought. Inspiration is another matter altogether and cannot be profitably discussed. "Hard reflection" is the way she describes the early planning stage for a new novel. By the time this stage is over, every chapter is created in note form, every character moulded. And, as a crowning nod, given names. Characterization and the shifting relationships between a fairly large cast of characters are the meat of Iris Murdoch novels. She likes "a wide lens", distrusting the novelist's tendency to concentrate on one or two characters whose point of view thus dominates the whole work. The Philosopher's Pupil, for example, although pivoting on the relationship between master and pupil, also moves its axis on to other characters. Indeed, the book is some way forward before it becomes clear that George, the pupil, has no worthwhile existence outside the sphere of his teacher, John Robert Razanov. And it is only gradually that John Robert himself takes command of the centre of the stage. Other themes, notably the death of one child set against the continued existence of his cousin, are allowed to seem more important than they turn out to most modern writing, in which an immediate impact is sought. But this is part of the Murdoch game. The eye of perception alters continually, subtly. There are tricks, red herrings. Even the God-like author does not get it right all the time. A described action may be modified by the word "probably". Besides this, the flow of the story is often interrupted by a narrator. Miss Murdoch says this is to make it easier to do some moralizing and also to give another perception to the story. The Sea, The Sea is notable for an enthralling opening section which is immediately denied:

be. Again, a kind of delaying tactic which goes counter to

"I had written the above, destined to be the opening paragraph of my memoirs, when something happened which was so extraordinary and so horrible that I cannot bring myself to describe it."

With such teasing in mind, it is interesting to hear Miss Murdoch talk admiringly about the virtues of the "straightforward" novel. My suggestion that her novels are as straightforward as an eel is countered with the advice that "There are a hundred ways to tell a straight tale". And it is absolutely true that a coldblooded analysis of most of her stories (very difficult to achieve) will reveal a surface narrative which could be in the old Boots lending libraries. However, she has chosen to uncover the underside of her stories, the dark secrets and obsessions which motivate the characters. This is where the oddness that people pick out as the Murdoch characteristic comes from "The dramas of the human heart" make the central matter of her books, she says. And the human heart is notable for its passion for

'secrecy. Much of what she uncovers is, unsurprisingly, sinister and longer. What are her views on frightening. Iris Murdoch's pre-politics, for example, and the occupation with the battle changing role of women? It between good and evil ensures sounds terribly dull, even to my

that there are always unpleasant figures hardly rising above the ever-threatening darkness below. Yet there is hope too. The struggle continues. Battered and bruised, the human spirit fights

In simple terms of readability, Iris Murdoch has two great gifts. She has a superb ear for dialogue, treating her conversationalists like dualists wielding words like rapiers. Backwards, forwards, in and out. It takes a supple mind to bring off several pages filled with nothing but the spoken word. The other gift is the unfashionable one of description - both of geography and character. She is not afraid of adjectives and will sometimes use a whole row of them without self-consciousness.

pretty vixen reclining while four fluffy milk-chocolate brown cubs with light blue eyes and stubby tails played tig on the lawn" "THE PHILOSOPHER'S PUPIL"

This visual concern was doubtless why The Bell was chosen to be turned into a recent television serial. And, indeed, why it worked so well, despite the very untelevisual psychological complications of its characters. Broaching the subject of description with Miss Murdoch, I am met with a lovely smile and "I like descriptions. I like places.

Our own visual imagery has now included a swan on the river, hailed in a friendly way by Iris Murdoch as "Old boy". This for some reason reminds me of the subject of children. The Bayleys have none, "Alas!". And Iris Murdoch was berself an only child, enjoying a "perfect trinity of love" with her mother and

There are a hundred ways to tell a straight tale

father. Elswhere she has said that her lack of siblings led her towards creating characters. Her fictional child - they usually come one at a time - is a powerful being, possessor of a secret greater even than the adults. This might be a product of Miss Murdoch's own solitary childhood imaginings, or of a lack of familiarity with the more ordinary, loud-mouthed variety parents learn to treat with contempt

Raising the subject, I am answered by the unarguable point that "the entry of a child into any situation changes the whole situation". Besides she admits cheerfully to enjoying creating children and "to having a very nice child" in the book she's writing at the moment.

Yet again, I'm struck by the gleam of excitement. Another book in progress, more creation. More reaching to something beyond the every day. Art, in her view, is one of the best ways of getting to the meaning of life. True art, that is, good art. For, as Plato pointed out, art can be a terrible trickster . . .

But before we return inevitably to "religion and morals" -Iris Murdoch's own summary of her major concerns - I want to stay with the everyday a moment ears, but we persevere. She used to vote Labour but now finds herself out of tune with modern politics. More particularly, she is a very convinced European, feeling the Common Market vital to Britain's interests "politically, spiritually and commer-cially." Earlier she had responded to my half suggestion that her vision of life might be limited after 30 years living in Oxfordshire by pointing out very firmly that she had travelled to America, Russia, Australia, Thailand, Singapore, India, Iceland, Japan, to name but a few.

Feminism she commends, though she is very opposed to its segregationist elements. She notes that the position of women, children and homosexuals have all improved over the "Earler Alex had again seen the past 20 years despite the prophecies of the disintegration and decay of our society.

Later, over lunch, I get a real whiff of crusading feminist spirit. And it is, of course, only after we have drifted back to "religion and morals". Like all sensible people, Iris Murdoch does not enjoy the formal interview. Before going to our meeting, I'd been given a clipping which opened: "Iris Murdoch makes good books and bad interviews." Possibly because of our position over the racing river (a way of ultimate escape?) our talk was relatively painless. However it was not till lunch that I realized that Miss Murdoch absolutely loves talking. And that she is very good at it - particularly when there's a move towards argument.

An extremely good restaurant ("Oh isn't food a pleasure!") in the wet streets of Salisbury is the location. Subjects, as they say, are wide-ranging. Herpes is an improbable opener. But it is the subject of women for the priesthood that really arouses the passions. Iris Murdoch is the most vociferously in favour and myself - daring pupil and teacher - most determinedly against. Although our hostess, daughter of a bishop, might claim more knowledge of the Argument, conversation was always the hallmark of the Oxford don. Perhaps it still is. The conversation of ideas is unfortunately rare among my contemporaries. Soon we move from the sex of priests to the more general question of spiritual belief. Excitement rises, the core of the matter probed more and more fiercely until in a haze or words and ideas I hear Iris Murdoch cry, "Christ is real! Christ is real!" John Bayley looks somewhat anxious, feeling, possibly, that the statement is open to misunderstanding. But I presume to see what she means.

Christ is real for her in the way a work of art is real. During the interview she had said, "I believe we live in a fantasy world, a world of illusion. And the great task in life is to find reality." Christ's story is one way of arriving at the truth which Miss Murdoch perceives as a religious sense. In her dramatic words, both philosopher and artist are present. It confirms my belief that, whatever the individual strengths or weaknesses of this year's Murdoch offering, the novel has seldom had a more original, more energetic or serious practioner.

I am also reminded with astonishment of the warning of a friend who had sat next to Iris Murdoch at a dinner party: "She doesn't speak. She hums.

Bolt from the blue

That the right-wing historian David Irving should question the authenticity of the Hitler diaries occasions no surprise. In a recent issue of The bookseller his publishers, Macmillan, readvertised his offer of £1,000 to anyone who could provide documentary evidence to refute any statement in his book Hitler's War. If the diaries are accepted, the money must be sorely at risk.

Singalongakiri

Dame Kiri te Kanawa goes pop this week, with a recording label all of her own. Her single, released this week with the catalogue number KANA-1, is culled from her classical album, Songs of the Auvergne, which has climbed higher in the LP charts than any previous Decca Classical release. It is currently at No 57.

What's in a name?

There could be some nominal confusion over the new issue of The Fiction Magazine. It has a story entitled "Outward Journey" topped with an etching of a departing train. It is by Peter Parker. Not that Peter Parker: this one is a writer who was a contributor to Gay News. Then Clive Sinclair makes two contributions: one is an interview feature. the other a gift of £3,000 sponsorship. Not the same Clive Sinclair, though. One is the young novelist and literary editor of Jewish Chronicle. The money is from Clive Sinclair of the microchips, and very welcome it is since the Arts Council has drastically cut the magazine's grant for the coming year.

Lacklustre

Britons, you fail to fire the literary imagination. The verdict is Anthony Burgess's, voiced in his Afterword to The Heritage of British Literature, to survey of post-war writing Burgess says Britain produced nothing to compare with America. There are no British writers to compare with Bellow, Mailer and Gore Vidal. Braine. Wain, Sillitoe and the 1950s new wave were not "a true literature of revolt", though he does have guarded praise for such Common-wealth writers as Doris Lessing, V. S. Naipaul and Patrick White. "The trouble generally with the English novel was the lack of anything to write about", he postulates. "I myself had to go to Malaya to learn how to write fiction."

Architect Peter Benton tells me that a copy of the Building (Third Amendment) Regulations 1983 which he recently purchased was three pieces of paper six inches by nine and a half, costing £1.25. "I think", he says, "my next set of building regulations will have to come from the Japanese."

Chew choice

I have it from the British Food Export Council's latest bulletin that toffees are much in demand from Israel, the West Bank, and the Gaza Strip. The Israelis like tham dried, which must be tough, and the people in Gaza prefer them in decorated tins. The Lebanese, in contrast, crave more whisky, and who can

Don't jump, Denis, don't jump!

During the Mau Mau rebellion in Kenya in the 1950s, there was much talk, usually after the ladies had left the room, of an oath taken by those admitted into the inner ranks of the insurgents. The Mau Mau oath, so the story ran, was of such unspeakable and obscene barbarism in what its swearers pledged themselves to do, and was accompanied by acts of such frightful bestiality as part of the ceremony, that it put the initiates beyond the furthest limits of civilization, and left them ready to do any act of darkness required of them thereafter, so entirely de-humanized were they by their participation in the grisly rites.

It has often occurred to me since that there are parallels for the Mau tively genteel political process, in the form of actions which, once taken. leave the taker unable to find any good reason for refusing any subsequent demand made upon him, however unthinkable it would have been only a short time before:

I have argued in the past that the Suez affair of 1956 was the Tories' Mau Mau oath; the shameless, unqualified naked lying on the part of the Government - to Parliament, to the country, to the press, to the United Nations, to the Americans, to Nato, to the troops themselves severed a tenuous but real link with that until then had principle survived all the exigencies and necessary compromises of politics, and in doing so robbed first Conservatism and then British politics in general (without Eden there could have been no Macmillan, and without Macmillan there would have been no Wilson) of something that has never been subsequently restored, though in recent years Mrs Thatcher has shown some sign of meaning what she says and vice versa. All of which brings me to Mr Healey. Whenever the election takes place, and on whatever grounds it is fought, he will be the key figure in the Labour campaign. Mr Foot is a burnt-out case, taken seriously by nobody on his own side or the other; Mr Shore's attempts to produce a coherent and realistic economic policy for his party have succeeded only in reinforcing the truth of the well-known computer-programmers' acronym GIGO ("garbage in, garbage out"); Mr Wedgwood Benn is the figure whom the other Labour leaders will conspire to pretend does not exist; Mr Merlyn Rees needs no such conspiracy, for he doesn't exist, nor is it necessary to invent him; Mr Silkin - but I think I had better stop here, lest I should say something we would all regret.

Mr Healey, however, is real, intelligent, skilled, forceful and almost ready. I say almost: "Oh, the little more, and how much it is! And the little less, and what worlds away!" For Mr Healey has a decision before him, and it is no light one. He has to decide whether he is going to take his own Mau Mau

Some say that he has taken it already, that he is forsworn beyond redemption. I think not, despite some ominous evidence; but his decision cannot be put off much longer, nor concealed once taken.

The nature of the decision he faces is obvious. Is he going to reject his party's policy of unilateral nuclear disarmament - which includes not only giving up our nuclear weapons but expelling our Nato allies from Britain - or is he going to stump the country telling lies? I put it as bluntly as that because there is no third choice for him, wriggle as he may. If Mr Healey says he believes that Britain ought to disarm on her own, he says that which is not true, for he does not believe it, and no amount of drawing attention to the small print in the draft manifesto (so full of weasel words, incidentally, that it might have been written by Sir Harold Wilson himself) will save him. Mr Healey believes in multilateral disarmament; he believes that unilateral disarmament is not, as CND falsely claims, a step towards that goal, but the negation of it; he knows that the inevitable consequence of Britain's abandonment of nuclear defence is our ultimate withdrawal from Nato, and he believes that we should not withdraw from Nato. In short, he believes that his party's policy is dishonest in conception, wrong in principle and disastrous in effect, and to assert that this is what he believes it is not necessary to bug his

Now he stands on the cliff edge of his personal doom. Once he jumps, Newton will do the rest; once he begins to say he supports his party's policy of neutralism and surrender, the Mau Mau oath will take irreversible effect, and he will be indistinguishable from Mr Hattersley. Mr Hattersley, after all, is no more in favour of his party's nuclear policy than is Mr Healey, but neither is he in favour of cannibalism, yet he will support both the one and the other without the smallest disturb

And is Mr Healey to step into the same mire, to insist, for the same ignoble reason, that black is white, hot cold, treachery loyalty, surrender resistance, war peace, falsehood truth? I was in the hall at Scarborough when Hugh Gaitskell promised to fight and fight and fight again to reverse his party's disas-trous commitment to nuclear surrender, and I watched those who thought like Mr Healey applaud that speech, while Gaitskell's enemies who were, and are. Mr Healey's enemies and this country's enemie sat with their arms folded. The policy was reversed, and Mr Healey played his part in its reversal. Nothing in principle has changed since then, save that Britain's commitment to Nato and its policy has become more important, and her abandonment of her commitment has become concomitantly more dangerous.

Mr Healey, of course, has not abandoned that commitment. The question is whether he is going to pretend that he has, whether, that is, he is going to cross a river which, for his character as an honest, honourable and patriotic man, will be not the Rubicon, but the Styx

He insists that the NPA is largely self-sufficient, acquir-ing most of its weapons from the armed forces, but receiving some financial aid from friendly nations". The NPA is at the start of a three-year build-up of military pressure in the south.

At any one time there are thought to be about 7,500 guerrillas under arms throughout the country, about 1,300 of them in Mindanao.

Support for them is often through fear. They have to live off the people, even collecting their own taxes, and can offer little except some hope for the peasants that one day things will get better. The guerrillas seldom last more than five years; then either disease or a bullet gets them. That has not deterred dozens of well-educated university graduates from joining their ranks. In Mindanao, the communists do not have to search for rallying issues: most are created for them by low wages and government policies which force more and more peasants off their lands in favour of agribusiness interests. The military tackles the war as though Vietnam had never been. Thousands of peasants have been moved from their farms to "strategic" villages in the hope that this will deprive the NPA of support and protect the people. The villagers hate the military for it. Caught in the Act of giving grants...

I was out of order in seeking to pursue a constitutional point while we were debating the sittings motion. This motion simply authorizes the committee to meet at 10.30 am on Tuesdays and Thursdays. However, while MPs were discussing it, we stumbled into a major matter of substance whose implications are much more substantial than the scope of the legislation

The Local Authorities (Expenditure Powers) Bill is, by any standards, a minor measure. Forty-one lines long and consisting of two clauses, it aims simply at putting right one of the innumerable mistakes to which the Department of the Environment is victim. The Government has launched an urban development grants programme, aimed at assisting local authorities to promote employment in their areas. Embarrassingly, however, the Secretary of State, Mr Tom King, discovered that although there was no doubt about his powers to pay the relevant moneys to the local councils, there was considerable doubt about the legality of the councils passing on that money as grants to businessmen.

Accordingly, this little Bill was introduced, as Mr King put it, to "clarify" the situation. In the Lexicon of King's English which I shall shortly be issuing for general edification, "clarify" will be defined as: "To seek to put right in a hurry legal provisions which are faulty because they themselves were rushed through Parliament without oroper consideration." Sadly, however, it has done no such thing. In fact, after a week of committee debate, the position, far from being clarified, is more confused than ever. Certainly, relevant grants by local authorities will be lawful if made after the Bill is enacted. The trouble is that councils may have made such grants before the Royal Assent is obtained. Sir-George Young the Under-Secretary, told the committee that "the chemes are proceeding" and that they are safe to do so because "the Bill gives cover to local government expenditure in the financial year

Unfortunately, no Bill can give cover to anything. Only an Act can do that, and this Bill will not become an Act until the middle of next month at earliest. Six weeks of the financial year will have clapsed, in which time the schemes will have proceeded - but without the protection of the indemnifying Act. When the Under-Secretary was asked what he intended to do about

Quite rightly, Sir Donald Kaberry, the chairman of House of Commons us that, really, mobody needed to worry at all. Even if there was some doubt about the legality of local authorities' grant-making powers during this penumbral period the Secretary of State could issue a certificate which would remove the ability of the district auditor is DOUNCE

Have the councils, then, heared a sigh of relief and agreed that everything is now all right? Far from it. The auditor is not their only problem. If they have been making payments during the period before the Bill becomes law, they are still liable to legal action by, say, businessman who is not getting a undermined by a grant-sided competitor, and the Secretary of Sate has no power to issue a certificate preventing such litigation.
So the local authorities, who asked for this Bill because they felt the previous legislation was dele-tive, now find that this indemnifying legislation even before it is ena may be defective as well. We, at a Opposition, are seeking to put masters right by tabling autendments to the Bill which by rendering its provisions retrospec-tive, will provide genuine cover to payments made before enactment. The Government, at last laving got this new problem into its thick head is considering how best to reac without being compelled to admit that it has made an even bigger mess of things than usual.

Incompetence by Evironment Secretaries in this government not, however, the constitutional point which Sir Donald most properly prevented me from discusing on the sittings motion. The issue is much more profound than that. In Standing Committee D we are reminding the Government that in our democracy no statement by ministers has of itself the force of law, It is no good the Secretary of State emolliently telling councils that they are secure just because he says they are; they know better. They know their only protection is an Act of Parliament so drafted that it covers every contingency in which they may be at risk.

This may be boring for the Government, even irksome. It is, however, very healthy that a small and unassuming measure such as this can remind ministers that what they say is of no consequence just because they say it. Their words have force only if they are uttered in accordance with statutes endowed with anthority by our sovereign Parliament. The author is Labour MP for

The second concern is King's College Hospital and the Maudsley, spreading inexorably like a timour through this part of the metropolis. The third is Nunhead cemetery, a few moments along the

In the early 1970s, Denmark Hill station retained considerable vestig-es of its former glory. The booking hall was a veritable palace; there was fine ironwork, brickwork, glazed arcades, a good booking office, a stationer's shop, a grand; long-case clock, and some original timber filigree work. Little by little, British Rail let it go. The clock stopped, and then vanished; the stationers closed; the timberwork remained unpainted and rotted; some was sawn off; broken windows were sealed with hardboard; rubbish collected on the embankment, and puddles on the Day by day commuters witnessed the accelerating consequences of neglect. By 1976, the station's condition had reached such a state that it was selected to represent London in the national Facelist competition organized by The Architect magazine (now defunct).

Despite considerable public inter-

Indeed, the underlying policy had been clearly stated by the then Southern Region general manager in his contribution to Railway Stations of the Southern Region. "the complete reconstruction with mod-ern methods and materials is the only way to get rid of a picture of an outdated form of transport in the public's mind".

A godsend for British Rail arrived one night in March 1980 when an arsonist burnt out the roof of the booking hall Enter British Rail hastily, with gangs of workmen to make things safe and by doing so demolishing far more than the arsonist, destroying spectacular

They opened an appeal which raised £4,000 from local people. Jeremy Bennett, the society's chairman, aided by Jack Jones (former-TGWU general secretary) and Terry Jones (former Monty Python) then handed the operation over to the Southwark Environment Trust, which would become the agent in further restoration, together with the cheque for £4,000 duly blessed by Sir John Betjeman. Enter Sir Peter Parker, with an environmental panel from BR. Perhaps the local initiative could extricate BR, quite literally, from a hole, by taking on responsibility for the station building. Negotiations took a year, at the end of which the Southwark Environment Trust had an option of a 40-year lease on the building, a beneficial occupier, and an interesting pattern of financial; contributions: £34,000 raised by itself through collections and private. charities; £56,000 from the Historic Buildings Council for the restoration of a listed building, £20,000 from the GLC; and a grant from British Rul to match the total pound for pound (probably still cheaper for BR than the costs of demolition and rebuild

The proposed use for the building is a real ale pub with beer brewed on the premises. The locals are enthusiastic since the building is being restored with a community

Most importantly, the laborious ground work undertaken by the Camberwell Society should make it easier for similar organizations to do the same elsewhere. For once British Rail had grasped the concept of leasing out, its staff proved particularly helpful. On the other hand, not every community is blessed with former trade union general services or Monty Pythons, so they will have to rely on this case as a precedent.

Unfortunately, not every station building for which British Rail has little affection can be so easily isolated and re-used.

On Saturday the Givic Trust presented the Camberwell Society with its Pride of Place commendation for their efforts to save the station, at a ceremony - complete with real sie - in the station itself. In two weeks, Bouis begins for restoration work. It could be the start of a new era for our railway Torches bobbing in the darkness, four boys walked through the tropical night. From the roadside came a stream of machine gun fire. One was killed immediately. The three others lay wounded.

As a jeep pulled up to help them, the gunmen waved the driver away. "We'll take them to hospital", they said. But they never got there. The following day their bodies were found stabbed to death after a night in a "safe house" used by the Philippine Constabulary. The boys had been out frog hunting. Soon after, the agent alleged to have led the killers shot three men in broad daylight in front of a school in the provincial town of Tagum. After representations he was reluctantly arrested, only to be released within

He was recruited in the war against the communist New People's Army (NPA), and he is one of the reasons why the Philippines is the only country in Asia where communist insurgents are gaining ground.

Lasaca's methods are repeated all over the Philippines. Wherever the communists are active, civilians are "borrowed" or "salvaged", in Filipino terminology by the military.

They are never seen alive again.
The Government's proclivity for using men like Lasaca, who kill, torture and maim, and then decline to discipline them, is convincing the hard-pressed people of Mindanao that they cannot expect justice from the local military and government. The threat from the NPA seems to have convinced some police and paramilitary units that anything is justified in maintaining law and order and rolling back the insur-

In a gruelling, rainless summer, the burned red-brown hills of Mindanao, long stripped of timber, typify the exhausting problems of the whole country. The rains will come in the next month or so, but relief from oppressive one-man rule and economic policies which dispro-portionately benefit the multi-nationals and the Manila elite is

FIRMNESS PAYS AT COWLEY

The return of industrial strife to the Cowley factory of British Leyland was taken in many quarters as the most convincing evidence yet that the economy was truly on the mend. Within weeks of the company launching a car with great sales potential, the Maestro, and being for the first time in some years in a position to promise its workers not retrenchment and cutbacks, but production bonuses and secure jobs, 5,000 of that same workforce went on strike and brought the plant to a standstill.

Four weeks later the two aspects of the dispute which stand out most are its apparent triviality, and the obvious bitterness and resentment that many of the strikers feel towards BL.

Now, with the prospects of a return to work brighter than at any time since the strike began, thanks to a night of hard bargaining between the management and the leaders of the two main unions involved, Mr Terry Duffy of the engineers and Mr Moss Evans of the Transport and General Workers, the question is whether that bitterness will force a continuation of the strike, or whether the proposed settlement will allow more normal industrial relations procedures to reassert themselves.

But first, how does the settlement deal with the seemingly trivial issue which provoked the strike - the desire by the management to make all its employees work "bell to bell" and so to abolish the established of each shift?

Here the company has gained a victory. It seems to have persuaded the union leaders that it is not going to withdraw its demand, that all its employees must work for the full time for which they are paid. So it should be in a position to secure a further increase in output, which on the company's figures is equivalent to a hundred more cars a week, worth an extra £25 million a year. Moreover, the company can fairly claim to have demonstrated its willingness to stand firm and to face a potentially crippling strike at a time when it would have been all too easy for it to return to the practice of the 1960s, when strikes were simply bought off in order to keep the production lines moving. It has therefore given its answer to many who believed that the determination of management to manage would crumble once the unions reasserted themselves and were no longer cowed by the threat of unemployment.

What management has agreed to is the creation of a joint committee which will examine the state of industrial relations in the plant with the specific purpose of finding out what has gone wrong at the plant. This should in union eyes at least provide the key for a less autocratic style of management - a shift away from the take it or leave it approach, personified by Sir Michael Edwardes, in favour of consultation and agreement.

Whether or not this is desirable depends on whether both sides can be trusted. Management must not use it as an excuse for weakness; unions must refrain from being mindlessly obstructive. And it has to be said that the precedents on both sides have not always been encouraging.

That said, it is surely in the interests of both sides to try to move forward along this path so that the resolution of this conflict does not merely fertilize the seeds of the next one. April 25 in Lisbon: the day of the red carnations, when the young officers of the Armed Forces Movement overthrew the halfcentury-old dictatorship, opening the way to independence for Portugal's African colonies and to democracy for Portugal itself. How long ago that seems. Today is in fact the ninth anniversary and the Portuguese are voting again, but the novelty and worn off.

Democracy is not mainly to blame for economic troubles which Portugal shares with the rest of the world. But elected governments have not been notably successful in managing those troubles. The expected victory of Dr Mario Soares's Socialist party in today's poll will not, if it is confirmed, be a sign of renewed confidence in proposals for social betterment through democratic change. The "white man's burden' was an acceptable attitude for many enlightened people in the last century, but even then the Russian Empire was not an attractive example of imperialism. The present Soviet version would be particularly repugnant in a devout Muslim country, Five years of leftist and even if it were not being imposed by force of arms. But it could not put an end to the vicious factional strife among the Afghan Marxist-Leninists, and it certainly guaranteed that in the minds of most Afghans the regime was damned as the mouthpiece of a hated alien invader. Material progress for the population is clearly impossible while Moscow continues with its colonialist war.

Suggestions that a change of policy would follow when Mr Andropov succeeded Brezhnev have proved premature. There has been a tendency in the West to exaggerate "indications" such as the increased reporting in the generally reticent Soviet press of casualties suffered by Soviet troops in battle with the insurgents. In fact some of the cases recently given prominence in Moscow newspapers were actually the same "heroic deaths" reported months before for propaganda reasons in the local Soviet press. The governments of the West and the non-aligned countries must redouble their efforts to persuade the Soviet leaders that much more is to be gained by withdrawing their forces than by reinforcing them. Sir, Your leader, "The peace of Prague" (April 21), was unworthy and a confirmation that disagreement on important issues has given way to enmity of spirit which vitiates mutual understanding and conciliation. I do not refer to your remarks on the World Peace Council but to those directed at "people concerned with day to day management of the CND", one of our member organizations.

To assume malign intent or manipulative wizardry is somewhat presumptuous (although bandwaggon-jumping is not unknown) particularly by those whose own political preferences do not encompass an urgent or constructive approach to disarmament issues.

A phenomenon tike CND might be expected to provoke curiosity and sober analysis rather than dam-nation but even quite reputable critics, such as the Bow Group, have failed to use the openness of the peace movement to get hold of the real facts, on which credible opinion should be based.

For anyone who knows people like Joan Ruddock or Bruce Kent, or who has witnessed the dedicated energy of their colleagues, the insinuations and attacks on their integrity are incomprehensible and deeply disillusioning. They serve a popular and growing movement which is not susceptible to manipulation or anything resembling the discipline with the political parties.

The peace movement is not interested in "one-sided disarmament". It is interested in initiatives which would start the disarmament process moving after 35 years of fruitless multilateral negotiations. Joan Ruddock surely has a point when she criticizes the Govern-ment's record. Certainly international tension and conflict has not noticeably diminished and armaments have increased in both numbers and sophistication throughout the world without cease since 1950. Had we been invited we would have given serious consideration to sending an observer to Prague as we did to the World Peace Council's conference in Warsaw in 1977. This would have been in the context of having a more vigorous presence at the European Nuclear Disarmament conference in Berlin next month which has drawn vitriolic condemnation from the Soviet Peace

This body, like so many commen-tators here, has failed to comprehend the nature of the non-aligned and independent peace movement its concern for harassed counterparts in Eastern Europe. But if politicians from opposing parties have to collaborate to make our system work, and if governments with diametrically opposed philosodiies strivine towards military superiority can still maintain diplomatic links and jointly run international agencies, who is to suggest

I bieves abroad

From Frau Reinhard Marks

Sir, A note of warning should be sounded not only to Britons planning to visit Seville (letter, April 16) but also to diplomats having to live in Lendon. The town seems infested with thieves, who prey on foreigners.

On April 9, when I returned from visit to the local library in the afternoon, thieves had visited our small, fully, furnished, fully serviced flat in London, SW I. The doors were locked as I had left them and there seemed to be complete knowledge of where to find things.

All my jewellery, was stolen, my noney, my diplomatic passport, my bank cheques and savings book, my luggage keys, my alarm clock, crocodile handbag, cassette recorder

Trade with Japan

Sir, In dealing with Japan, British interests differ greatly from those of other EEC members.

Primarily, this arises because Britain's "comparative advantage" lies in "invisibles", whilst that of Germany and the other members lies in manufactures. Strong "invis-ible" exports from Britain to Japan result in an overall surplus on current account, year after year - in 1981 nearly $2bm. Other leading Commonwealth countries, though for different reasons, also run surpluses with Japan - Canada nearly three quarters of a billion dollars in 1981 and Australia/New Zealand a similar sum.

In contrast, the rest of the EEC runs heavy deficits - in particular, Germany, which Bundesbank figures showed had a current account deficit with Japan in 1981 of $3bn.

The EEC Commission stance here in Tokyo is to emphasize visible trade deficits (arguing for Japanese export restraints, higher prices in Europe and increased penetration for manufactures into Japan) and completely ignore "invisibles". Correspondingly, one can observe a major campaign by German export-ing companies in Japan - everywhere one now sees BMWs, Mercedes and VWs - and German wine is available in all "off licences". German exports to Japan increased dramatically during 1982.

One result of this is that German-Japanese industrial links are being greatly strengthened; witness the rapidly increasing direct investment by Japanese companies in Germany and the dramatic fall in the proportion of Japanese-EEC investment coming to Britain - down to only 12 per cent in 1981. Another result is that Japan will take steps to reduce "invisible" imports, perhaps by deliberately "assisting" shipping and insurance, etc.

Britain must state her own requirements independently Tokyo. The Japanese are perfectly willing to oblige (as they did in limiting car shipments) and "bar-

The manifesto of any party is at best a statement of its aspirations in the event of its being returned to power and at worst an attempt to fool most of the people most of the time. It is not a commitment to any detailed policies, nor does it entitle a future government to carry out every item in its manifesto regardless of current public opinion of the changing character of the national interest. No party - and least of all a party in opposition - can foresee the practicalities of power for a year, let

The myth of the manifesto was given some substance - strangely enough - by the late Lord Salisbury's doctrine that the Conservative majority in the House of Lords would not oppose in principle any legislation coming to it from a Labour government with a majority in the House of Commons, provided that the measure had been embodied in its election

Minister and shares

From Lord Cockfield

Sir, In the House of Commons on March 30 Mr Dennis Canavan, MP, sought to introduce a Bill to prevent any takeover of Anderson Strathclyde plc by Charter Consolidated. In the course of his speech he suggested in the clearest terms that my public denial that I had abused my position as a member of the Cabinet and of the Government by dealing in the shares of a company which was seeking to take over Anderson Strathclyde was untrue. I need not emphasize the gravity of this allegation. It is without a scintilla of justification.

The facts are that on November 6, 1974, four and a half years before I became a minister and seven and a half years before I became Secretary of State, I added to my small portfolio of Stock Exchange holdings 2,500 shares in Charter Consoli-dated. I have retained these shares in unchanged beneficial ownership since that date and retain them still. On April 6, 1982, I was appointed Secretary of State for Trade. On

The very hard line taken by Academician Tikhvinski and his team would surely have convinced all but the most starry-eyed or purblind CND supporter that peace can only be preserved by serious and responsible negotiation rather than by participation in Soviet propa-ganda fests and one-sided Western disarmament.

on negligence!

From the Director of the Anglo-Japanese Economic Institute. Sir, Mr Norman MacLeod's letter (March 16) on the United Kingdom's invisibles surplus with Japan reminds me that the British side has never seen eye to eye with the Japanese on this subject. This institute tried in vain for years to secure British figures to set against those produced annually by the Bank of Japan, so we always published the Japanese version and the British went by default.

Eventually the United Kingdom side talked of differences in the ways Japan and the United Kingdom collect and assess their statistics" and gave figures falling far short of the Japanese estimates: and now Mr MacLeod says Japan's method "greatly exaggerates the sumius"

But the Bank of Japan's details like Britain's, I presume, and other nations' - are compiled in accordance with the International Monetary Fund's Balance of Payments Manual. The British Committee on Invisible Exports, in surveying world invisible trade, seems per-fectly happy to quote IMF sources in relation to Japan and Britain.

I do hope Japanese experts won't start calling British figures "greatly exaggerated" or "misleading". Yours faithfully, REGINALD CUDLIPP, Director, Anglo-Japanese Economic Institute, 342/6 Grand Buildings, Trafalgar Square, WC2. April 7.

So far as the Charter Consolidated affair was concerned, I decided that even though my small shareholding represented only 0.0025 per cent of Charter Consolidated (ridiculously referred to by Mr Canavan as my "vested interest") I should take no part in the decision on the reference and I have played no part in it. I have neither been consulted nor expressed any view about any official decision relating to it.

Mr Canavan apparently observed that the entry in the company's register relating to the shares in my own name had been closed. He failed to note that the same shares were held in uninterrupted ownership by a nominee so that there had in fact been no dealings of any kind with my shares on my behalf. Yours faithfully,

COCKFIELD, House of Lords.

Aid to Third World

From the Director of Voluntary Service Overseas

Sir. We were interested to read Professors Baner's and Yamev's views on aid and development published in Monday's issue of The Times last week (April 11). Their assertions that "aid cannot significantly promote Third World development nor relieve poverty" will surprise the villagers of Abora Patoako in Ghana, who have increased their own food supplies through initially using the skills of a VSO agriculturist; and the Eritrean refugees who have requested training by a VSO mobile building unit so that they can construct their own schools and health centres in the South Sudan; and the Nepali weavers who are expanding their markets and increasing their sales with the assistance of VSO volun-teer, Pam McLauchlan; and the throughout the Third World who are increasing their own self-reliance and capacity for self determination with technical cooperation from western development agencies.

Western aid has been an indispensable part of the means through which the people of the Abora cooperative, the Showak building unit. Dhankuta village industries and many more community initiatives throughout the Third World have achieved some economic and social progress for themselves. And because these projects exist, others of the poorer people in many parts of the world have some hope for a better future.

Aid is effective if channelled in the right direction. The people of Abora, and Showak, and Dhankuta will tell the learned professors so. Yours faithfully,

FRANK JUDD, Director, Voluntary Service Overseas, 9 Belgrave Square, SW1.

Endangered species?

many millions of other people

From Mr Christopher Ward

Sir, As Fleet Street is never at its most accurate when reporting its own affairs, I would be obliged if I could correct errors in various reports about my recent departure from the Daily Express.

I was not dismissed. I would still be editor today if I had accepted Lord Matthews's proposal to appoint Sir Larry Lamb as editor-in-chief. Lord Matthews envisaged a successful partnership between Sir Larry and myself. I saw the appointment as an unacceptable erosion of the editor's authority, a recipe for internal anarchy and a dangerous precedent for all editors. I was not willing to stay on and edit in those circumstances and conse-quently Sir Larry was appointed editor instead of editor-in-chief.

Reports of a pay-off totalling £160,000 are, unfortunately, an exaggeration; my farewell wasn't tearful, it was cheerful; my grandfather, not my uncle, drowned on the Titanic and he played the violin, not the clarinet, in the ship's orchestra; I didn't tell my staff, or anyone else, that April 15 was an unlucky date for my family - it wasn't until I read The Times next day that I was even aware of the "coincidence" of losing my job on the anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic.

I am not re-joining the Daily Mirror, as the current issue of the Speciator confidently states. I am enjoying a well-carned rest before deciding what to do next.

Incidentally, Daily Express editors are not the endangered species Lord Cudlipp suggests in his amusing letter to you last Friday. History shows that Express editors, when dislodged from their nest, flap their wings and soar off to new habitats where they thrive.

Mr Robert Edwards, Mr Roger Wood and Mr Derek Jameson all became successful editors of other newspapers and remain so today. Mr Alastair Burnet is a disringuished television news presenter. Indeed, the experience of fighting off predators at the Express only sharpens the survival instinct and enables us to adapt to any terrain or Sotheby's 'synergy'

From Mr Michael Vallely

Sir. When Geraldine Norman described (April 15) Sotheby's use of the term "synergy" to explain the percieved lack of understanding in the proposal by Mr Cogan and Mr Swid, she quoted Webster's definition: "combined action or operation (as of muscles or nerves)

Perhaps your correspondent underestimates Sotheby's mastery of transatlantic jargon which, she suggests, may be distorting communication between the parties. Professor H. Igor Ansoff, of Vanderbilt University, Nashville, used the word "synergy" to describe "au effect which can produce a combined return on the firm's resources greater than the sum of its parts - frequently referred to as *2+2 = 5" (Corporate Strategy, Pelican, 1981 p75) and accepted usage by, for example, John Argenti and D. E.

This is, therefore, apposite in relation to a takeover, merger or developing a new product. Sotheby's, in alleging an absence of synergy, may be giving faint praise. Yours etc.

bodies such as the Union of Muslim Organizations have tried to campaign for recognition in British law of a special status for Muslims, so that issues of divorce and inheritance would be controlled by Islamic institutions under Islaof Muslim education. But Parliament is never likely to pass laws removing a section of citizens from the jurisdiction of the British legal system; and those behind the new council of mosques seem to recognize that.

They also recognize that most Muslim children will be educated in state schools, and the most they can hope for is a say in the type of religious eduction their children receive. Building up the professional status of the local Imam would help to open school doors to them.

More can be done to adapt Muslim structures so that they make the best of the oppor tunities that exist. The British legal system is not entirely incompatible with Islamic law, nor is the eduction system incompatible with the essentials of Islamic education.

Exploring that potential is the necessary next stage in the creation of a genuinely British Muslim culture, but it is hard to see it happening without some national representative body leading the effort. Which body it is, only the Muslims them-

EARL HINES Innovative jazz pianist

Earl Hines, the jazz pianist and bandleader who was an early colleague of Louis Armstrong died on April 22 at a hospital in Oakland, California to which he had been admitted earlier in the week following a heart attack. He had performed his last engagement the previous weekend in San Francisco, where he had lived for many years; he was 77.

OBITUARY

His partnership with Armstrong in the late 1920s brought him to prominence as one of the great innovators of jazz plano-playing his style was subsequently copied and adapted to such an extent that it became the foundation for almost every succeeding generation. Throughout the jazz world he was known by an appropriate nickname, "Fatha".

Born Earl Kenneth Hines in Duquesne, Pennsylvania on December 28, 1905, he grew up in a musical family: his father flattening the harmonic mer-played the trumpet with a brass vals of the third and the sevent band and his mother was an organist. The young Hines straight and, while still at guns.

He moved to Chicago with his first full-time employer, the singer Lois Deppe in 1922; there he met many of the young jazz musicians who had moved north from New Orleans during the great migration of that cra, including the clarinetist Jimmy Noone, with whom he played at the Apex Cafe, and, in 1927, Louis Armstrong. Hines recorded with Armstrong's Stompers in May of that year, but collaboration was not to blossom until the latter half of 1928, when Armstrong's new Hot Five, including Hines, recorded both as a unit and as members of Carroll Dickerson's Orchestra. Among the masterpieces they created were "West End Blues", prefaced by Armstrong's introduction, "Weather Bird", a duet for a small group; he was contentrumpet and piano.

Whether in imitation of Armstrong or not, Hines was developing a piano technique which became known as "trumpet style". Donald Pleasence, long the odd man out among our leading actors, tomorrow appears as Dr Johnson in BBC1's controversial The Falklands Factor. Interview by Bryan Appleyard

The personification of uncommonness

Donald Pleasence gazed into the pale spring light of Albermarie Street, a hint of madness in his eyes. Suddenly Millions of people watching and you the bald head swivelled chameleonlike in response to the movement of a waiter in a far corner of the room.

The poor minion scuttled away.

Most of this did not happen, It should have done but it did not. Pleasence in the flesh is not at all sinister, displays very few signs of madness and only swivels at the request of the photographer. Indeed he is evidently a little impatient with the very word "sinister". "I'm a kind of lovable figure really. I'm loved by middle-aged women. They're my fans. When men stop me in the street for my autograph it's always for their wives, who must be about 50."

But, whether he likes it or not, the latter half of Pleasence's career has been marked by sinister roles, odd characters and, failing that, people under pressure to the point of madness. Nothing could have more completely made the point than the television ads for Pils - "the odd

It was not ever thus. In the late Fifties he was everybody's idea of the common man, a role he played month after month in the live television dramas of the time. Happily he recalls those interminable travelling salesmen and the days when directors used to cry "Let's get Pleasence for the ordinary bloke!" But even as he hankers after the commonplace he exposes his an-

But, after the dramas, came the television series Armchair Mystery Theatre of which he was host and occasional star. The public attached the name to the face and the face to an air of mystery, to a sense that something rather strange was going on. But it could not simply have been the effect of casting. At the age of 18 Pleasence left his first job as a booking clerk at Swinton Station in Yorkshire — "my parents had influence". He told the station master he was off to become an actor. Finding this very odd the railway company sent in a high-powered auditor to discover if he had been selling bogus first-class tickets and was attempting to abscond with the proceeds. The label "odd" was stock point. If they made interesting films then I would appear in interesting films. But the fact is that only horror movies are made at the moment This at least is a funny horror film and I'm quite looking forward to it."

With a little prompting he drifts into a happy reminiscence about Cul-desac, the Roman Polanski film in which he portrays a nice guy driven mad by his wife and friends.
"I was watching a couple of film:

I'd rented from the video shop round the corner, and I thought films have got so complicated. They're all shot like commercials – your nose, your glasses and so on. And I thought how wonderful to see a film like Cul-deyou read into it, not what the director puts into it by way of fancy cutting. It was a straightforward film in the sense that it could have happened -like Waiting for Godot. The weirdest things are those which bear a resemblance to the truth."

The Falklands Factor - Don Shaw's play to be shown on BBC 1 tomorrow - bears a very close resemblance to one truth and a slightly more distant similarity to another. The first is the invasion of the Falklands by the Spanish in 1770 and the second is the invasion by the Argentinians in 1982. The BBC is running it as a Play for Today, the first historical drama to appear in the slot. Pleasence plays Dr Samuel Johnson, who was persuaded by the Prime Minister, Lord North, to write a pamphlet against war with Spain.

first night at Covent Garden.

Johnson at the time was struggling with poverty and the fear of madness, not to mention a vigorous hatred of the pro-war writer Junius, the scribe Who Supported Our Boys. "I think it's very important to remember that when Johnson was doing the pamphlet on the Falklands he thought himself to be on the verge of insanity. It was a genuine fear so far as I can tell from the books I've read..." - he swoops into the whisper - "... but how do you know about history? He didn't have any money, never had any money, just worried all the time about what was his place in the world and whether he'd made a terrible mistake.

coffee-table book image of the portly mandarin of Eng. Lit. There are still the perfectly turned sentences but they are delivered as from the depths of a vastly depressed soul. The Pleasence whisper is used to elaborate the effect of a man drifting back and forth from the here and now. Small wonder that he gets so few common man parts when he does the uncommon ones so uncommonly

But it all leaves him with a slightly maverick image, as if all this oddness somehow puts him outside the scope of the term "distinguished actor". And "maverick" is certainly a term he warms to a good deal more than

Yes, I think so, I don't like establishment people who know what they're doing or . . . I must be precise about this . . . I don't I don't know what is going to happen tomorrow . . " (whispers) "The world is full of people who know exactly what's going to happen tomorrow, which seems to me to be a pity..."

He drifts off into thought but turns abruptly back into the alert professional when the photographer asks him to pose. Obediently he turns up his collar and gazes out into the pale spring light of Albemarle Street, a hint of madness in his eyes. . . .

Television Ill-starred scenario

James Galway's Music in Time is the title of a good popular introduction to music published jointly by Mitchell Beazley and Channel 4. On the cover, in smaller type, it says "written by William Mann". In coffee-table television spin-offs the real author counts for less than the star who lends his glittering Music in Time the series (Channel 4) is a big international co-production which Mann acts as "music consultant". Someone else contributes a "scenario", and Galway pops out like a jack-in-the-box to add what the handout calls his infectious enthusiasm" to the proceedings. Yesterday, while the cameras ranged over choristers, candles, carvings, crucifixes and more choristers (the scenario?), Galway piped up with little remarks designed to prove that medieval music is not really frightening at all. One wished he would either pipe down, or else get his own pipe out and play it. The musical juxtapositions were indeed interesting but what this eye-glazing programme desper-ately needed was some of that genuinely infectious enthusiasm which Mann brings to the book. But that, alas, would not have been permitted by the scenario.

I have not yet caught up with Jane Glover's Orchestra, which BBC1 are running at roughly the same time, but I have not missed a minute of BBC2's riveting series Affred Brendel Masterclass. "The pedal markings Beethoven wrote are not there for nothing. Whoever ignores them is committing a crime", said the guru apropos a noted trouble-spot in the "Tempest" Sonata. "If you feel something you shouldn't interfere by knowing it." The tuneless grow! and almost spastic facial expressions with which he accompanies his own playing somehow reinforce the impression that he is right in there among the mysteries.

In Wise Man and the Wheel (Channel 4) James Bellini delivered a new blow to the portly person of Richard Attenborough by suggesting that his emaciated hero was not so much a revolutionary as a misguided Victorian eccentric. The programme, which dwelt at length among the dispossessed poor, based its simple but devastating case on the fact that Gandhi's most enduring legacy has been a cruelly efficient system of capitalist exploi-

The textile workers of Bombay have been on strike for over a year, and have even been joined by the police in demon-strating for higher wages. Violence, said Bellini with pugnacious glee, was now a real possibility. Underedited and overlong, this programme was none the less a timely reply to all those Oscars.

When even Radio Times pokes fun at the Enrovision Song Contest (BBC1) it behoves the rest of us to fall silent. "Vivre!" sang the French contestant, heaving over his keyboard. "Vivre! Encore un reveil ivre!" "Do re me fa so la n do!" sang the Norwegians, determined not to rest on the laurels they had won two years previously be scoring zero points. The suprise was that the winner, a torch singer from Luxembourg, really could sing. Terry Wogan officiated with his customary blend of derision and reverence.

The opening edition of The Late Clive James (Channel 4) was, as Dennis Hackett observed last week, duff beyond belief. Nice to see that the rotund maestro has now pulled his finger out: Saturday's show was well up to standard.

Contemporary Ballets

Paris Opéra/ Théâtre de la Ville

The big bit with most of the public in the Soirée de Ballets Wichita Falls") by Pat Metheny Contemporains at the Paris Opéra was Alvin Ailey's Au an edgy pulse, but there is Bord du précipice, about the destruction of a pop-star musician through adulation, sexand drugs, Across town at the Theatre de la Ville, Karole our of the dancers explains the Armitage has been astonishing Experimental Group (GRCOP) not only by the violent energy of her dancing but by the rockconcert volume of her music. But first, something completely different and no less original. The other creation in the programme at the Opera itself was a work lasting half an hour for only two dancers and a pianist. The music is eight of the 12 Emdes for piano by Debussy, excellently played by Georges Pludermacher. The choreographer is Andrew de Great, who first won attention with his work for Robert Wilson's "operas" but lately has made ballets as a freelance and for his own group. The dancers were Wilfride Piollet and Jean Guizerix, husband and wife stars of the Opera, who have long been interested in using their prodigious classical technique for contemporary ends. De Groat says he has tried to make the work an equal collaboration of dancers, choreography and music; there are set and free passages, and the relation of dance to music is different in each Etude.

Nouvelle Lune starts with solos gradually building a relationship between the two dancers that makes the most of their remarkable rapport, so that communication sometimes occurs right across the huge stage, and they even seem mutually aware without needing to be able to see the other. A decor (by de Groat) of deliberately artificial-looking plastic clouds is brought into the action, descending and rising again; two doves also take part contained disregard and assurat one moment.

The action is an extraordinary mixture of natural movement and ballet technique; building on Piollet's strong feet and Guizerix's powerful jump, also the remarkable control that enables both to accomplish the most delicate gradations of effect, as subtle and varied as the music. Physically, to sustain such movement so long and accurately is a tour de force, but equally impressive is the emotional quality they convey.

This work was an oasis of quiet, sensitive and absolutely gripping artistry between Glen Teday's highly rhetorical Voluntaries, which began the bill, and Ailey's new work that ended it. Perhaps it is not surprising that some people left the theatre at the intermission while others were only just arriving (I was there the day after the première, and word-of-mouth spreads quickly).

Au Bord du précipice is a wild extravaganza that never lets up for a moment. The character called simply He has an opening solo in a white sun (the jacket worn open to reveal a bare chest), then changed to black leather. His wife, his desire and drugs are all represented by She. in a series of increasingly revealing tights, sometimes with enough movement inven-tion to hold the interest. The title Massacre on Mac-Dougall Street hints at a respect for Balanchine - Armitage used to dance his ballets in Geneva before coming via Merce Cunningham to her present independent style. Her other piece at the Théatre de la Ville even used elements of rather formal pas de deux partnering at times, although always with a new angle, and there is nothing formal about the relationship between her and Clark, which is displayed as fiercely aggresive. Dressed by Charles Atlas in outrageous mixtures of colour, shape and pattern, with fre-quent changes of clothes, footwear and even wigs, Armitage and her dancers in both works convey the sort of selfance one sees in many of gave a concert performance of today's young people. Massacre is danced to recorded music of Rhys Chatham, with whom she worked in her Drastic Classicism. For The recording of 1959 and his earlier Last Gone Dance Armitage has the composer David Linton on stage, playing a gleaming collection of percussion in duet with pre-recorded tapes. Although the idiom is entirely different, the relationship of musician and broadened — the scenes with Fricks are taken much and two dancers is as intense as in Nouvelle Lune at the Opéra.

Perhaps somebody should try putting the two works in tandem on one programme. The school parties packing into the Young Vic to see their set book are greeted by a Voytek set of baroque splendour that seems rather to herald a performance of All for Love. I hope they will not be put off. Keith Hack's production is as successful a demonstration as I have seen of blending and inventing styles and periods.

It was overwhelming. No wonder that the cast was largely relegated to a secondary position behind this orchestral torrent. Three of its members will undertake their roles in Bayreuth: Hermann Becht's Alberich, properly malevolent if somewhat raddled at the top of the range; Siegmund Nims-gern's Wotan, very youthful in sound and almost a baritone in his upper register ease; and Siegfried Jerusalem's Loge, craftily characterized but with a smallish voice drowned by the

Songmakers' Almanac Wigmore Hall

I saw only one red rose on Saturday for Shakespeare and St George: "Let us garlands bring" was the generous response from the Songmakers' Almanac in one of their most enriching entertainments.

The obvious, in the form of a superfluity of sounds and sweet airs, was avoided, as was, generally speaking, the coy and the didactic. Instead we had six artfully planned acts, with Prologue (Dankworth's "Com-pleat Works") and Epilogue (facry envois from Tippett and Wolf). In between came Germany, Denmark, Scotland, Russia and England, with "A Garland of Fancies" in the middle to enable us to hear Poulenc's and Britten's exquisite settings of "Tell me where is fancy bred". Sarah Walker sang them with fitting tenderness and whimsy. Compliments were variously paid: from Frank Harris ("If Shakespeare had asked I would have had to submit") to Heine, who felt Shakespeare's only fault lay in being an English-man. To try to prove the point we had Schubert's "Horch! borch! die Lerch" from Sheila Armstrong, and the Antony and Cleopatra "Trinklied" from Peter Savidge.

The biggest compliment perhaps was Graham Johnson's compilation of the Strauss and Brahms Ophelia songs. Sheila Armstrong, starting Brahms's unaccompanied How should I your true love know", gave a finely judged portrayal of Ophelia's developng destruction, using tellingly even the weaker parts of her voice. Berlioz's "Death of Ophelia" followed from Sarah Walker, with Peter Savidge providing a postscript from Shostakovich in his dark, declamatory setting of Marina Tsvetayeva's "Hamlet's Dialogue with his own Conscience".

It was good to be reminded too, in his setting of Sonnet 66, of the historical ubiquity of 'Art made tongue-tied by authority" before turning to England and, among others better known, Sarah Walker's perceptive performance of Rubbra's Take, O take those

Rock An honesty which pierces romance

Joni Mitchell Wembley Arena

Joni sings most affectingly to her friends: Betsy, Sharon, Carol. Her observations have the musing, informal tone of letters and conversation, studded with the surprising details which have always lent her songs their special, precise resonance, such as the recent reflection on her friends' children: "We look like our mothers did now/When we were those kids' age".

She has an electric guitar now (a fat-bodied single-cutaway jazz model, to which she has adapted her folky finger style adapted her folky inger style with typical originality) and a Hollywood-slick four-piece backing band. Still, though, the prevailing thrust is of an honesty which consistently pierces and brings down romance on the wing she wants to be a mild thing running fact. to be a wild thing, running fast and free, but she is increasingly willing to admit without self-pity to the banal frailties which to some extent hobble every life, be it ever so grand.

pagnant majesty it should but Saturday evening's concert followed the path of her most recent album by reveiling in the injection of rock 'n' roll beneath the complicated surfaces of her song structures: her guitarist. Michael Landau, provided raging post-Hendrix power chords and solos in "You Dream Flat Tires" and "Wild Things Run Fast". Russell Ferrante (keyboards), Larry Klein (bass guitar) and Vince Colaiuta (drums) sewed up a variety of glistening backdrops, taking their cue from her trademark swaying strum and allowing her voice to range freely through its wonderful variety of timbre.

Towards the interval, she shuffled the deck. "God Must Be a Boogie Man", from the unsuccessful Mingus album, swung on finger-snapping bass and wire brushes on the snare drum; the early "He Played Real Good for Free", still a moving song, was accompanied only by her own piano; "Big Yellow Taxi", in which she rather endearingly muddled up the words, was done folk-club style, alone with her guitar; and she sat at the dulcimer for "A Case of You".

The big set pieces, one in each half, were taken from the later "Reluge of the Roads", autobiography in the picaresque and metaphysical modes. Sterling 'may rise to $1.70 this year'

By Our Financial Staff

An early Conservative election victory would give a big boost to sterling and the pound could rise to $1.70 against the dollar in the second half of this year, according to James Capel, stockbrokers.

However, sterling is likely to be subject to bouts of nervousness until the election, the stockbroker says in the latest edition of its International Bond and Currency Review.

Its expects greater stability in the oil market after August and the dollar to be generally weak later in the year. On this basis, sterling could strengthen to $1.50 and up to $1.70 if the Government is returned.

Apart from uncertainties over the election, the months ahead are likely to be nervous. James Capel says the present Opec pricing structure could come under threat up to August because of seasonally weak demand. A $25 a barrel oil price is possible and this could push sterling down to between $1.40 and $1.45. Thereafter rising inventories and recovery in the world economy should help to underoin the oil market and sterling could rise against a weakening dollar. But its effective ex change rate could still weaken because the traditional hard currencies will benefit more from the dollar's decline, James

Capel say. The brokers are cautious about prospects for British interest rates. They say short-term United States rates are likely to remain stable for a couple of months but a firm pound could still allow another half-point cut in hank base rates to 9.5 per cent before the end of next month. Capel expect only a slow world recovery by historical standards, with output rising by 3 per cent on average and inflation by about 5 per cent in the main industrialized coun-

Hammer in $600,000 salary deal

Dr Armand Hammer, the American oil magnate and art collector who made his first million more than 50 years ago, has demonstrated yet again that he has no intention of giving up the gentle art of earning money. Although he is only one month short of his 85th birthday, the good doctor has signed a remarkable employment agreement with his com-pany, Occidental Petroleum, that will guarantee him work and a salary of at least $600,000 (£390,000) a year until February 1989, when he will be in his 91st year.

After 1989, the agreement will be renewable automatically every year, unless either the company of the then nonagen-arian Dr Hammer gives six-month notice that it is time to end the working partnership.

Hammer: the gentle art of earning money.

If he retires, Dr Hammer will still be entitled to a salary enqivalent to half his previous year's income until he dies. It will be index-linked to changes in the Consumer Price Index, but only - a characteristic touch this - if the index goes up, not if it falls.
Dr Hammer has been chairman and chief executive officer of Occidental since 1957, when he bought into the sleepy $34,000 Californian oil company as a means, so the story goes, of earning some tax writeoffs in his retirement by drilling a few dry holes

This ploy, as is now well-known, proved a spectacular flop, when Occidental discovered oil not only in California, but subsequently also in huge quantites in Libya and the

Apart from his other sources of private wealth, Dr Hammer believed to be the only capitalist whose office has signed photo-graphs of both Learn and Romald Reagan, reflecting his lifelong devotion to furthering trade with the Soviet Union owns 1,160,010 shares in Occidental bloodletting It was inevitable at some stage that attempts by the banks to sort out inter-western countries are simply bailing out irresponsible nations that are their own worst enemies.

Would a little bit of financial blood in the streets not concentrate the minds of governments and financiers alike?

Şix American economists with access to the right ears in Washington have now come out into the open on this. In an article in today's Journal of Eco-nomic Affairs, they argue that such bail-outs merely benefit "both creditors and debtors at the expense of the ordinary citizen". They say there is no justification for lending more to countries such as Poland and Mexico "without a clear understanding that a debtor nation's policy, if pernicious, will be substantially changed." Otherwise, the banks should bit the bullet

This is a silly idea. To start with, it is wholly ideological.

More important, proponents of private enterprise, who effectively prevented international agreement on recycling and left it to the banks, cannot now complain if the banks work according to what they see as their interests.

After all is said and done

When the affairs of business are over and the last resolution has been made, then is the time to reflect upon a time well spent at the Inn on the Park. It goes without saying that the Inn on the Park is one of Londons more elegant meeting plac As a business arena, however, this internationally celebrated hotel at the corner of Hyde Park boasts facilities second to none.

The superbly appointed suites lend themselves to any function, whatever the matter in hand, whatever the numbers involved.

Our farmous Ballroom has been entirely redesigned even more of an elegant showpiece now - and any gathering may be held there in a style that is nothing short of magnificent.

Whilst on the subject of magnificence there's the superb cuisine. And the impeccable service. Our business clientele can expect only the very highest standards – what else from a hotel whose restaurants are acknowledged to be the finest in London? It must be said that a business meeting at the Inn on the Park will never be a run of the mill affair. And if it must be said, say it at the Inn on the Park.

Stock prices boom as Wall St waits for bumper profits

Wall Street has been going from record to record, pointing to a strong economic recovery. Last week's report of a rise in real gross national product at an annual rate of 3.1 per cent in the first quarter sharply understates the up-ward trend in non-farm ac-tivity. When the effect of a drop in farm output – always hard to measure on a season-ally edirected constrainty basis. ally adjusted quarterly basis -between the fourth quarter of 1982 and the first quarter of 1983 is removed, non-farm gross domestic product rose at an annual rate of more than 5 per cent in the first quarter. Wall Street is looking for big profit gains this year and in 1984. Many important corporations are already pro-ducing improved profits, and the big three in the car industry will-show a profit of almost $1,000m in the first IBM's profit rise of almost a quarter has led to specu-lation about a rise in dividend from the computer group or a new stock split. IBM's stock has been showing large gains, which indicates powerful convictions among investors.

While the economy is gaining more and more momentum, inflation remains subdued. The consumer price index rose at an annual rate of only 0.4 per cent in the first quarter of this year. The gross national product deflator showed a rise of 5.8 per cent at an annual rate when the national income figures were announced for the first quarter

Even money supply has stopped its frantic boom. On budget deficit

Friday night, the Federal Reserve announced M1 had fallen $3,100m in the week to April 13 – a far bigger decline than anyone predicted. As a result of this drop, M1, is back to below where it was in the week of March 9. The fact that there has been no growth in money since early March will help to restore confidence in the financial markets and facilitate a drop in interest rates. The markets had become nervous about the money boom set in train in mid-1982. The Federal Reserve Bank of St Louis pointed out last week that of the decline of 606 basis points in the 30-day commercial paper rate between February 1982 and March 1983, 512 basis points took place before the end of August 1982, before the recent money boom gained any significant momentum. The bank concluded: "Since November. although M1 has continued to grow at about a 15 per cent rate, short-term rates have remained relatively stable."

If the Federal Reserve

maintains the negligible money growth that has now gone on for five weeks, interest rates will probably fall accompanied by a weakening of Even so, the dollar may not weaken by as much as would seem justified by the weakness of the US trade balance. This is because the high level of US real interest rates provides a powerful attraction to international capital.

Mr Martin Feldstein, the chairman of the council of economic advisers, drew attention to the connexion between these high real interest rates, the strong dollar and the federal government budget deficit in a speech in Chicago in which he concluded:

"The only appropriate way to reduce our structural deficit in international trade is by reducing the budget deficit that is the basic cause. If the budget deficit is reduced, the real long-term interest rate will fall and this will reduce the pressure that keeps the dollar so high.

Deploring official inter-vention as a means of achiev-ing a weaker dollar, he said: The basic fact is that the value of the dollar can be changed only by modifying the goals for our domestic econ-

66The steady improvement in our results derives from a significantly better performance in the U.K. due to our policy of continued investment in new plant and an increasing awareness of the importance of productivity amongst our employees. As expected, the going has been tougher overseas but we may have seen the end of destocking. The merger of Denver Metals with certain of our South African manufacturing interests has given us a stronger base for long term growth. in our Annual Report I expressed the hope that the Group would continue to make progress. Currently I believe the trend to improved profitability in the U.K. should continue and that it will offset some further decline in our income from overseas. Our overall prospects therefore remain unchanged.

New centre for US By Baron Phillips

Construction and property group Taylor Woodrow plans to develop a new complex called the World Trade Centre at Tampa, Florida, through its American subsidiary at a cost of about $55m (£35.2m).

The announcement coincides with a visit from the Tampa "super task force" which is in London this week promoting Taylor Woodrow proposes to build the new centre on a site close to the downtown area, the port and Tampa's international airport. Plans include almost 300,000 sq ft of offices, a 300befroom hotel conference and meeting rooms, retailing and a world trade club.

A spokesman for Taylor Woodrow said over the weekend that construction for the centre was expected to begin in

This was revolution in microcosm. For Mr Maxwell, read the cruel hand of capitalism, for the SOS committee the spontaneous people's uprising, committed to equality and "rights". "We don't have a chairman", one member said. "We want everyone to have a say. We'd rather die with pride than join up with a stopid, money-making organization like Maxwell's."

But the early days of idealism and brotherhood were soon to be over.

Inside the ground, the supporters inside the ground, the supporters poured on to the pitch, the SOS committee having politely informed the referee and players that they would stay there until 3.15, thus delaying the match for a quarter of an hour. Most departed at the appointed time, but some 50 appointed intit, but some so-dichards stayed on, the number gradually dwindling to a dozen. London clubs on different tracks

The distance between Queen's Park Rangers, Fulham and Chelsea, covers 10 stops on the underground map, and 37 points in the second division table. The three West London clubs all went their separate ways on Saturday, yet they could find themselves standing on three different platforms next season.

Rangers will be in the first division; last year's FA Cup finalists and the only League club to be assured of promotion so far, they need only beat Wolverlampton Wanderers at home on May 7 and Wanderers at home on May 7 and gain one point from their other four games to go up for the first time as champions. In 1968 and 1973 they rose as runners-up.

As champagne corks ricocheted around their dressing room to celebrate an own goal by Leeds's Hart, a sobering note was introduced two floors above. Jim Gregory, the chairman, responsible for lifting Percent into marking for lifting Rangers into relative prosperity as well as into the modern age, announced that he is retiring at the end of the seasop. There are plans for a consortium, led by Terry Venables, the manager, Rangers' away record is second only to another West London representative, Wimbledon, and they have proved that their ability reaches far beyond the confines of their own synthetic pitch. As they are almost sure to claim the Combination league title as well, the necessary reserve strength is available and their future among the elite is likely to be as smooth as the Loftus Road surface.

Fulham will probably stay in the second division. Since November, like Rangers, they have been strong promotion candidates, but their position started to weaken, like Wolves, when they met a resurgent Full Halfe G Poyton: J Hopkins, K Leicester City. Before the fixture at the beginning of December Fulliam were: 13 points ahead of Leicester. After Saturday their lead was reduced effectively to one.

Mac-Donald moved back to become an Donald moved back to become an impressive central defender, although two late and cheeky headers back to his goalkeeper frightened his manager "to death", and Daly came into midfield. In late April May still awaits a recall.

Aitken was reduced to two and Miss Connachan looked to be in dire feet and a half. Aiming just inside trouble when her second, from a treacherous lie in the right rough, Leicester have been able to relax because they have been so far away from contention. Wilson's decisive strike in the 65th minute, after Peyton had made two notable saves and one that was scarcely credible in a match as entertaining as most in the first division, has changed all

Much depends on Leicester's reaction to pressure. Unbeaten for 11 matches, they hold the advantage in goal difference. They are at home to Bolton Wanderers and Burnley and away at Leeds United and Oldham. As well as entertaining Carlisle, Fulham must make three awkward journeys to Sheffield Wednesday, Rangers and Derby County. County.

Chelses may be in the third division. The club with potentially the biggest support in London sank into the bottom three for the first time this season and considering their present financial position, relegation could prove disastrous.

At least they have yet to meet three of their lowly companies Rotherham, Bolton and Middles-borough. Their destiny, like Rangers and Fulham, lies in their own trembling hands.

Liverpool.

Norwich City Whether prudence or merely shrewd business sense persuaded Liverpool to delay championship celebrations until their last bome match, two weeks hence, it was a wise decision. The crown looked decidedly askew, jolted by a mix of their own detachment and Norwich

City's lively intentions.

Experience has taught that there is little logic in going to Antield to try to hide behind a protective screen. Nor is there necessarily more mileage in attempting to take on Liverpool at their own game, for their home record writes its own testimony. But Brighton, in the FA Cup, and now Norwich – both unlikely predators – have demonstrated that given the right approach and favourable circumstances, there can be reward in initiative. Pointers to a more ambitious philosophy for visitors to Merseyside, perhaps.

Gillingham, with a twisted ankle. Bristol, their opponents in the final next Saturday, may shake their heads and look wise after resting the bulk of their cup squad, but over the last five years it has not been Leicester's policy to put out the shadow XV in the penultimate game before the final.

Smith's injury occurred when he slipped in the second minute of the game. Gillingham's when he was involved in a maul at the start of the second half. Moseley's doctor was able to prescribe rest and physio-therapy and Leicester will cross their fingers - and anything else they feel may help.

Waterloo are enjoying a fine Waterloo are enjoying a fine season in their centenary year and like Coventry last week, this was their first visit to Pontypool Park. From the first scrum on Saturday, when they were forced to retreat at speed and Pontypool's early powerful charges resulted in a try in the fourth minute, Waterloo seemed destined for a similar fate to that of Coveniry Coventry.

Pontypool, forced to make two changes - Butler and Huish were unavailable - from the team which will presumably take the field next Saturday against Swansea in the cup final, look to be in for a comfortable and not-too-taxing rehearsal. But, despite their forward superiority, they struggled for the points and only in the last few minutes did they and three penalties to a goal and two manues. It was an ill-tempered opening period. A couple of players should have been sent off. But if the referee was incapable of cooling their tempers, the heavy downpour at the start of the second half, presumably did. It came at an awkward time for Waterloo for they were in the lead at that stage, and the changing conditions probably wrecked their chances of victory.

Brown had scored the first try

Waterloo failed to control it at a scrum near their line. After Cottes had replied with a penalty. Peter Lewis responded with one of his. Although McEveley and Cain, the props, were in dire straights, Fisher managed to retain his share of the scrums possession. Wisely, Water-loo tried to keep the ball away from the enveloping presence of the Pontypool eight. They were justly rewarded with a superb try. With a handling movement from their own line they turned desperate defence into attack.

From the scrum on the Pontypool line, Christopherson sliced through the defence to score near the posts. Cotter, who has scored more than 500 points this season, converted. He extended the lead after half-time with a long distance penalty. No one has beaten Pontypool at home this season, and when it began to look that Waterloo might just

For a Bath supporter, and an Englishman, there can be no more acceptable way of passing St George's day than plunging a spear into the heart of the Weish dragon. The way in which the Englishmen dealt with the pride of the Principality gratified the most patriotic of hopes at the Recreation Ground on Saturday. For a Bath supporter, and as

In years past. Bath's rugby has sheltered in the shadows thrown by those historic pillars which support this celebrated Georgian city. Cardiff soon found that even their best endeavours were not going to be good enough. At no-side, they, like the rest of us, could appreciate how Bath have averaged over 32 points in their last eight matches.

Cardiff's single try, converted by Ring, who also kicked a penalty goal, was a good one, but born chiefly of Cordle's individualism, while Bath exploited team under-standing to bring four spanking tries for Trevaskis (his 31st), Halliday, Trick and Martin

In between there had been a virtuoso display by Trick, a spitfire among gladiators as he swerved outside Neil O'Brien and accelerated past Goodfellow to score behind the post. Here, Palmer landed his third conversion to go with two penalty coals.

After the Danzatore saga, there will emulate last year's Ballymoss was another debate for followers of the O'Brien stable when Caerleon, ho had been heavily backed for the Derby in recent weeks, trailed in almost last in the Rogers Gold Cup Ballymoss Stakes at the Curragh on Saturday. Caerleon, who started at oeds on, lost his place abruptly approaching the turn for home and Fat Eddery said that he began to gurgle. He subsequently suggested that a proce of mild may have that a piece of mud may have lodged itself in the horse's throat.

This morning Deep Roots will was working badly only 48 hours before his withdrawal cannot conceivably be regarded as a good exercise in public relations. We all acknowledge and admire O'Brien's professional genius, but his secrecy is becoming obsessive. Ladbroke's have introduced

Lomond into the 2,000 Guineas beeting at 10-1. Seattle Slew's halfbrother won a maiden race easily at the Curragh as a two-year-old, but disappointed when only third behind his stable companion, Glenstal, in the National Stakes at the Curragh. He was - so they say suffering from a throat infection afterwards and certainly proved his well heing when beating the four-year-old Patron in the Gladness Stakes at the Curragh earliethis month. A gamble went astray in the Eshe

Cup when the 5-2 favourite, Sharee Dancer, was beaten by So True, But the coup of the day seems to have been landed in the Tim Doody Road Marking Stakes at Kelso. Despite Run in Tune's starting price of 25-1, his victory was anticipated by a bold course punter who staked £500 at those odds. Congratulations are due to the successful owner trainer, Don Eddy, a coin and stamp dealer from Stocksfield in Northum berland. Mr Eddy's plan to win £250,000 over Arrigle Boy in the Grand National may have ended in disaster, but Run in Tune made no

ICE HOCKEY: WASPS WITH BUTTERFLY STINGS

Many a slip: Wasps whack an early goal before slithering out. Picture: John Evans.

Until Saturday night at Streatham, Rod Binns had a 100 per cent record in his career as a head coach, but then the British Championship final, sponsord by Heineken, spoiled it, Robert Pryce writes. Dundee Rockets found the solution to Binns' formula for success by beating Durham Wasps 6-2.

For a while, Durham were allowed to hope that run could continue.
With Katernyuk once again formidably solid in goal, they survived a number of penalties and the smatained Dunder pressure to emerge form the second period only 2-1 in arrears. Dundee's three

ONE YEAR M.A. IN SYSTEMS IN MANAGEMENT

Are you interested in learning how to use systems concepts to tackle a wide range of problems in any type of organisation from small businesses to public services and multi-national corporations? Fitteen years' research, involving some 200 projects, form the basis for this demanding 12-month course. This research has developed and refined methodologies in which systems thinking provides a means for analysing human activities and identifying the procedural and communication weaknesses which underlie many complex problems. The specification of requirements for operational and management information systems is a particular application.

The course, covering both the methodology and its application to the basic functional areas of organisations, is completed with a flysmonth project, often based in an external organisation. Applicants normally have either a degree, or a professional qualifi-cation coupled with experience of working in an organisation. A number of studentships and TOPS awards are available for suitable applicants.

For details contact: F. Schwarz, Department of Systems (Ref 36), University of Lancaster, Lancaster LA1 4YX. Tel (0524) 65201, extension 4488.

The post a suitable for a scientist trained in the techniques of molecular biology and the successful candidate will be expected to set up and run and independent laboratory as well as working in collaboration with skin physiologists in the department.

Geography - Human Geography (Post Ref. 4)

The appointment will be in the Department of Geography but associated with the Centre for Urban and Regional Development Studies, an S.S.R.C. designated Research Centre, which is attached to the Department. The successful candidate will be expected to develop research on the impact of developments in information technology; this should be relevant to the programme of work on urban and regional change being undertaken in the Centre. Candidates should outline previous research experience and suggest possible future work in the specified area.

Geology - Economic Geology (Post Ref. 5)

The appointment will be made in the field of economic geology, with special reference to the relationship between the genesis of sulphide ores and the evolution of carbonaceous matter within the sedimentary record. Experience in ore petrology, geochemistry and sediment diagenesis would be relevant.

Virology - (Post Ref. 6)

The vacancy is for a Ph.D., or equivalent, with experience of the techniques of nucleic acid analysis to complement existing work on the viruses associated with infantile diarrhoea and respiratory syncytial (RS) virus in investigating their structure and strain differences. The Times Guide to career choice

Money for art's sake

"If you are interested in art and you turn out not to be a second Hockney, you can always become a designer". That is still the assumption which bedevils most "careers" thinking about art and design. The two subjects are remorselessly linked in colleges, in careers directories and in people's minds.

It is not necessarily a false association but it is a narrow one. Careers in "art and design" are broader than conventional images may suggest. To make a living in the "art world" can lead to jobs as diverse as high-powered international dealings or therapy with the disabled as well as actually painting or sculpting. And design is just as relevant to industrial management and large-scale engineering manufacture as it is to the heady world of, for example, haute coutur

It is in the field of design, that exciting things are now happening for careers. At long last the overall importance of product design is being appreciated in British industry and not a second too early as a succession of enterprises have gone down in the face of better-designed imports from more design-conscious competition.

This seems to be changing. The Prime Minister herself has gone out of her way to stress the importance of design. The Department of Industry is running a Design for Profit campaign to open the eyes of management to the benefits which good designers can

In The Times recently, there has been a lively correspondence about the subject, involving educationalists from institutions as diverse as Eton, the University of Salford and the London Business School and Imperial College. All agree on the importance of design, whether in engineering and construction or fashion and advertis-

The moral is clear. Young people with an interest in art and design need to sharpen their understanding of what these actually mean. The fine artists and craftsmen should reflect on where their urge for personal creativi-ty might lead. Those who are attracted to design, meanwhile, need to realize the vast scope of their vocation, extending as it does across fields as diverse as record sleeves and motor cars, armchairs and washing machines: Most important, perhaps, many who already see themselves as technologists must become aware of their role as designers as well because they cannot be successful in one function without also being good at the other. Obviously, there is little uniformity in discussing prospects for careers in art and design. As the message about the importance of design sinks in, it is hoped that the opportunities for industrial designers will grow and flourish. Artists and craftsmen mean-while are likely to have difficulty in making ends meet unless they supplement their work by teaching and lecturing (and part-time opportunities are now much reduced). Alternatively they can use their training to launch into something

Edward Fennell on training and opportunity in art and design

The trend nowadays is that design courses are seen to be highly vocational whereas art courses are of a more general kind with no specific career outlet. This may not be a bad thing. Art students have a marvellous chance simply to develop their own creativity during, for example, three years of a degree course. As one college of art and design principal said: "No other form of undergraduate study forces you to draw on your own imaginative resouces as much as either art or design - and that is a good preparation for a career."

Unfortunately a "good preparation for a career" by no means guarantees a job. A collapsed textile industry, for example, undermines openings for highly qualified textile and fashion designers just as much as for the manual workers of Yorkshire and Lancashire. On the other hand, British designers are being called on to invigorate the fightback by surviving firms. And artists and designers are much more willing to shout about their achievements.

Nevertheless much needs to be done to improve career prospects for artists and designers alike. As David Sherlock, principal of Winchester School of Art, said: "We have the best system of art and design education in Europe, perhaps in the world, yet that is not evident in our industry and manufacturing. Job prospects in Britain are limited and many of our students have to go abroad to Italy, France and the US for work".

Confirmation of this comes from many of the Paris fashion houses which rely on British-trained designers for their success. And of the 10 designers who make up Milan's famous Memphis partnership, two-George Snowden and Gerard Taylor -are British.

Specialization lies at the heart of the system of training. One-year foundation courses, usually for post THE UNIVERSITY OF ASTON A-level students, give a broad introduction to a number of skills before intense specialization on the subsequent degree. The list of options is long but a few examples demonstrate the range. Manchester Polytech nic has an industrial design course specifically geared to meet the needs of the transport industry, Middlesex Polytechnic allows students to concentrate on graphic information design which prepares students for jobs in television and computer graphics. Manchester Polytechnic's graphics technology course is orienprapries technology course is often-tated towards jobs in printing photography and packaging Leicester Polytechnic's engineering industrial design course attracts A-level mathematicians and scientists.

The training is therefore highly specific-probably why our students have a flying start when they go abroad to work. It is also encouraging that the colleges are able to respond quickly-courses in computer graphics are the latest example-as new technologies emerge. The only prob-lem is that the college system sometimes has a "hot-house effect" which is remote from the icy winds of the British industrial climate. There is bags of creativity but it may be a bit short on practicability.

The message from most employers is that students must become more aware of the constraints in the industrial system within which they will work. There has to be a better bridge between our young artists and designers and their subsequent em-ployers.

 Horizon turns its attentions to the origins of a particularly unity disease that is sweeping through New York's Greenwich Village male population. THE KILLER IN THE VILLAGE (BBC2 9.30pm) is AIDS - Acquired immune Deficiency Syndrome. Thousands of men, predominantly homosexual, have contracted the ease and hundreds have already died. The disease, with symptoms including extreme tatigue, persistent fever and dramatic weight loss, is recognizable when unsightly bruise-like blemishes appear on the akin. How did it originate? Horizon has been to the United States and dug as deep as it is able but although scientists have discovered what it is not caused by they are still a long way from discovering what does cause it. The programme includes interviews with sufferers and also victims who later died. Not all are

It is Welsh week on Radio 4 and among today's offerings from the Principality is the start of a daily history-on-horseback series with Wynford Vaughan-Thomas riding THE WAY THE NORMANS RODE (4.40pm). His trek begins at the castle rules of Crickhowell and t there he visits the famous, the infamous and the not-so-well-known imposing Pembroke Castle. As he rides, Wynford Vaughan-Thomas recalls some of the historic events which police train local residents to describes places of interest he patrol their own neighbourhood. This comes across and reports on the has been particularly successful in characters he meets daily.

Steam from the Sellafield cooling towers billowing out over the small coastal town of Seascale near by (Photographs: Brian Harris).

Thirty years on nuclear health fears persist in Cumbria Against the background of the Sizewell inquiry, Ronald

The Paul Pedersens, father and son, step on to the beach at Ravenglass from their small fishing boat, the Seaspray, carrying boxes of lobsters and flat fish across the sands from which the tide is draining rapidly. They have been checking their creels off the Cumbrian coast since 4 am.

"If what them barmy beggars say is right then I should be glowing like a light bulb", Mr Pedersen junior says. His father adds: "They say the Irish Sea is dangerously contaminated, but there is nothing wrong with him. As he speaks he brandishes a fat and powerfully clawed lobster at me.

He began fishing among the wrecks and shoals off Sellafield more than 20 years ago. His last full body scan at the nuclear plant showed radiation levels that offered the same risk as smoking two cigarettes a year or driving a car 18 miles a week.

The calculations were made by scientists of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and Mr Pedersen accepted them as a full answer to the risks of fishing in the Irish Sca.

Faux, our Northern Correspondent, visited west Cumbria where nuclear industry has been a fact of life for more than 30 years. He finds that the Sellafield complex of British Nuclear Fuels still generates strong feelings for and against the industry. Nuclear energy is seen to be an essential and acceptably safe source of power by many of the 10,000 people who work there. Those who do not may regard Sellafield with healthy scepticism but accept that, without it, west Cumbria would become an industrial desert.

males was significantly lower than expected.

A huge public relations exercise has been launched to improve the public image of nuclear power and its peaceful benefits.

The decision to allow the building of Thorpe (the Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant) has been accompanied by much investment at Sellafield, turning it into probably the biggest building site in Europe. Up to £50m a year enters the local economy in wages.

But the doubts remain even though many of the doubters have become resigned to living so close to Sellafield - a name that covers British Nuclear Fuels's Windscale and Calder works and not chosen, the company insists, to remove the memories of Windscale leaks and contamination.

"Nuclear power has a lot to live down", one Whitehaven sceptic said. "It produced the being found in the sea off Windscale, but there is no hard most violent and destructive Dr Peter Tiplady, a specialist single explosion ever, its seccommunity medicine, ondary evils are invisible and reported that in east Cumbria insidious, and, while it is "The only bad effect we notice", he says, "is that every time there is a scare story about poisoned water the value of our medical practitioners. British Nuclear Fuels's response was: "There is no decrepancey. One million times nothing will always be nothing. Compared with any other industry, nuclear power has an enviable and excellent safety record."

Letter from Dallas

Image-conscious city where money talks

History has bestowed two unforgettable memories on Dallas - the assassination of President Kennedy, and J. R. Ewing. Both in their different ways have deeply affected the place and given the city an obsession about its image. Right now, there are a lot of people who wish J.R. would get out of town.

A simple white memorial to President Kennedy stands in the city centre and a lot of Dallasites still resent being constantly reminded of such a shameful day, President Kennedy, after all, had no real connexion with Dallas.

Lee Harvey Oswald supposedly did the deed from a small, cluttered room on the fourth floor of the book depository building, a red official-looking structure with lots of dark corridors and gloomy little rooms. There is now talk of turning the room into a Kennedy museum, but not everbody agrees. It might create a negative image.

And not everybody agrees that J. R. Ewing and his evil entourage have been good for Dallas. Some people complain that the image of the city across the world is of a heartless, oil-obsessed town with but one god - money.

In part the image is accurate. The city is booming there is a frenetic page of construction and a partial construction and a partial consense of excitement. Constitution the long drive in from the airport - nothing but offices going up, highways under construction, factories being built. There is electricity in the air - the same feeling of extreme optimism that New York evokes. The difference is that New York does it with culture, Dallas does it with money. Dallas is determined to be an international city. It brags that its airport is the biggest in the world, bigger than the entire island of Manhattan. The other weekend the mayor threw another of his lavish dinners for a group of ambassadors invited down from Washington for several days of pampered luxury, an exercise that is all part of the international image-building. Of course, their excellencies wanted to see South Fork Ranch, known in real life as the Box Ranch, first home of the Ewings until the real owner got fed up and told everybody to pack up and go. The ranch you see on tele-vision now is several miles away from the 1,600 rich acres of the Box Ranch, itself about 20 miles out or town looked a little ridiculous in their blue jeans and Texas hars, all standing in a neat line benezih the first, fierce ach of the season while civic disti-taries clambered around with great armfuls of cameras and made nice speeches. After the photographs they all gratefully repaired to the swimming pool area to sample huge quanties of barbecued steaks and its cold beers, while a band played softly in the back.

The city is frantically creating a cultural personality A whole new arts district is under construction where quaint little restaurants and antique stores will mingle around the magnificent newly remodelled theatre, a huge new museum and the new symphony hall. Dallas decided it wanted some culture so it did the natural, obvious thing - it went out and bought

Once a year the city boss probably the biggest state fair in the land, where they do all manner of crazy things while devouring mountains of traditional delicacies, such as Cokes, "corn dogs", candy floss and pizza slices.

Of course, the civic leaders like you to know their history, to know how the Alamo-was fearsomely avenged in the place where the San Jacimo river meets the Buffalo bayon,

There is an aesthetic awareness amid all the panic of building, an awareness kindled in the comfortable embrace of wealth. Sir Henry Moore created the masterpieces of sculpture outside the city hall, itself a building of imposing beauty surrounded by a skyline that is beginning to look a little like New York and Chicago.

And so it continues, stories of money and the images i can buy. One wonders what the blacks and the other poor folks make of it all from their secluded little homeland to the south of the city, just the other side of the tiny Trinity river, where the images are so dreadfully real and not the least bit clusive.

Nesting is under way. Blackbirds and song-thrushes are on eggs in their deep nests, with just their beak Etchings by Stephen Whittle, and a selection of original prints from the Royal Academy Graphics, Timaeus, 2a Salisbury Road, Moseley, Birmingham; Mon to Fri 10 to 4, Wed 10 to 7.30, closed Sat & Sun (until line 3) and tail showing above the rim. They sit tight, but fly off with a skittering cry if an intruder comes too close. Wrens are building the cock wren makes several domed hen chooses one of them and lines it with soft feathers. She usually lays six minute, red-spotted eggs. New arrivals from the South include house-martins, wheeling and brak-ing above the house-tops with a flash of their white rumps, and grasshopper warblers, which have become much more common in neglected, bushy patches of country-side in the last few years. On the moors, blackcock gather for their annual "lek", a communal ritual of fighting and mating the males spread their tails in a broad fan, and jump up and down in front of their rivals. Trees are still coming into leaf rather slowly. Horse-chestnuts are the most striking, with their brilliant green leaves, and their flower-spikes already forming. Oak and beech are sprouting cautiously; but under the oaks, bluebells are coming into their full glory, the colour of summer chies.
